

15¢

THRILLING RANCH STORIES

JUNE

A THRILLING PUBLICATION

ADELE ROPES A RAINBOW

A Glamorous Novelet
By THELMA KNOLES

IT HAS TO BE
A Complete Novelet
By RUTH ANDERSON

TILDA OF THE
TOMBOY SPREAD
A Romantic Novelet
By JOHNSTON McCULLEY

Romantic Stories of the West

Let your HEAD take you

(The average American today has a choice of just going where "his feet take him", or choosing wisely the course to follow. Let's skip ahead 10 years, and take a look at John Jones—and listen to him . . .)

"SOMETIMES I feel so good it almost scares me.

"This house—I wouldn't swap a shingle off its roof for any other house on earth. This little valley, with the pond down in the hollow at the back, is the spot I like best in all the world.

"And they're mine. I own 'em. Nobody can take 'em away from me.

"I've got a little money coming in, regularly. Not much—but enough. And I tell you, when you can go to bed every night with nothing on your mind except the fun you're going to have tomorrow—that's as near Heaven as man gets on this earth!

"It wasn't always so.

"Back in '46—that was right after the war and sometimes the going wasn't too easy—I needed cash. Taxes were tough, and then Ellen got sick. Like almost everybody else, I was buying Bonds through the Payroll Plan—and I figured on cashing some of them in. But sick as she was, it was Ellen who talked me out of it.

"Don't do it, John!" she said. "Please don't! For the first time in our lives, we're really saving money. It's wonderful to know that every single payday we have more money put aside! John, if we can only keep up this saving, think what it can mean! Maybe someday you won't have to work. Maybe we can own a home. And oh, how good it would feel to know that we need never worry about money when we're old!"

"Well, even after she got better, I stayed away from the weekly poker game—quit dropping a little cash at the hot spots now and then—gave up some of the things a man feels he has a right to. We didn't have as much fun for a while but we paid our taxes and the doctor and—we didn't touch the Bonds.

"What's more, we kept right on putting our extra cash into U. S. Savings Bonds. And the pay-off is making the world a pretty swell place today!"

The Treasury Department acknowledges with appreciation the publication of this advertisement by

THE PUBLISHERS OF THIS MAGAZINE

IF you're that man, here's something that will interest you.

Not a magic formula—not a get-rich-quick scheme—but something more substantial, more practical.

Of course, you need something more than just the desire to be an accountant. You've got to pay the price—be willing to study earnestly, thoroughly.

Still, wouldn't it be worth your while to sacrifice some of your leisure in favor of interesting home study—over a comparatively brief period in your life? Always provided that the rewards were good—a salary of $3,000 to $10,000?

An accountant's duties are interesting, varied and of real worth to his employers. He has standing!

Do you feel that such things aren't for you? Well, don't be too sure. Very possibly they can be!

Why not, like so many before you, investigate LaSalle's modern Problem Method of training for an accountancy position?

Just suppose you were permitted to work in a large accounting house under the personal supervision of an expert accountant. Suppose, with his aid, you studied accounting principles and solved problems day by day—easy ones at first—then the more difficult ones. If you could do this—and if you could turn to him for advice as the problems became complex—soon you'd master them all.

That's the training you follow in principle under the LaSalle Problem Method.

You cover accountancy from the basic Principles right up through Accountancy Systems and Income Tax Procedure. Then you add C. P. A. Training and prepare for the C. P. A. examinations.

As you go along, you absorb the principles of Auditing, Cost Accounting, Business Law, Statistical Control, Organization, Management and Finance.

Your progress is as speedy as you care to make it—depending on your own eagerness to learn and the time you spend in study.

Will recognition come? The only answer, as you know, is that success does come to the man who is really trained. It's possible your employers will notice your improvement in a very few weeks or months. Indeed, many LaSalle graduates have paid for their training—with increased earnings—before they have completed it! For accountants, who are trained in organization and management, are the executives of the future.

Write For This Free Book

For your own good, don't put off investigation of all the facts. Write for our free 48-page book, "Accountancy, The Profession That Pays." It'll prove that accountancy offers brilliant futures to those who aren't afraid of serious home study. Send us the coupon now.

Over 2300 Certified Public Accountants among LaSalle alumni

LASALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY

A CORRESPONDENCE INSTITUTION

417 South Dearborn Street, Dept. 6329-H, Chicago 5, Illinois

I want to be an accountant. Send me, without cost or obligation, the 48-page book, "Accountancy, The Profession That Pays," and full information about your accountancy training program.

Name

Address

City

Position

Age

THRILLING RANCH STORIES

Vol. XXXIII, No. 3

EVERY STORY BRAND NEW

June, 1946

Featured Complete Novelt

ADELE ROPES A RAINBOW

By THELMA KNOLES

Mark Blair thought she was too fragile a flower to be a rancher's wife—but Adele could dream of nothing better than sharing the hardships of life in Lost Valley with him! 13

Two Other Complete Novelts

TILDA OF THE TOMBOY SPREAD Johnston McCulley 38

A gun-fast man of mystery comes to the help of the girl boss of the Box D Ranch when a roaring cowntown feud rages furiously!

IT HAS TO BE Ruth Anderson 54

Alva Roberts of the Flying T faces a bewildering range problem when both she and her neighbor Jake Brandon want some Big Horn grassland!

Short Stories

ADAM FROM NEW EDEN Joe Archibald 29

Hattie Pringle of Milldew, Montana, promotes a padlockless paradise

WARRIOR DRAW Stephen Payne 72

Eileen Donnegan's love for that handsome sheepman spelled trouble

GIRL WITH A MAVERICK HEART Sylvia S. Elvay 85

No cowboy could put his brand on lovely Dale Gardner, until—

PIXIE OF PINON CANYON N. C. Raleigh 97

Charming Janet Lyle doesn't know how to compete with an artful siren

Special Features

AROUND THE BRANDING FIRE A Department 6

THE COWBOY'S MEMORIES Branding Fire Song 80

WESTERN RANCH GIRLS (Patricia Clark) Foghorn Clancy 82

THRILLING RANCH STORIES published every other month by Standard Magazines, Inc., at 10 East 40th Street, New York 10, N. Y. N. L. Pines, President. Entire contents copyrighted, 1946, by Standard Magazines, Inc. Subscriptions (12 issues), $1.50; single copies, $1.15; foreign postage extra. Entered as second-class matter November 9, 1935, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Names of all characters used in stories and semi-fiction articles are fictitious. If the name of any living person or existing institution is used, it is a coincidence. Manuscripts must be accompanied by self-addressed, stamped envelopes, and are submitted at author's risk. In corresponding with this publication, please include your postal number, if any. Read our companion magazines: Thrilling Western, Thrilling Wonder Stories, Thrilling Sports, Thrilling Love, Thrilling Mystery Novel, Thrilling Detective, Thrilling Football, Popular Western, Popular Detective, Popular Sports Magazine, Popular Love, Popular Football, Texas Rangers, G-Men Detective, Sky Fighters, Everyday Astrology, The Phantom Detective, West, Detective Novel Magazine, Masked Rider Western, Range Riders Western, Startling Stories, Rodeo Romances, The Rio Kid Western, Black Book Detective, Popular Crossword Puzzles, Best Crossword Puzzles, Exciting Love, Exciting Sports, and Exciting Western. PRINTED IN THE U. S. A.

Building this
A. M. SIGNAL GENERATOR gives you valuable experience.
Provides amplitude-modulated signals for test and experiment purposes.

RADIO SERVICING pays good money for full time work. Many others make $5, $10 a week EXTRA fixing Radios in spare time.

Learn RADIO by PRACTICING in Spare Time with 6 Big Kits of Radio Parts I Send You

Let me send you facts about rich opportunities in Radio. See how knowing Radio can give you security, a prosperous future. Send the coupon for FREE 64-page book, "Win Rich Rewards in Radio." Read how N.E.I. trains you at home.
Read how you practice building, testing, repairing Radios with SIX BIG KITS of Radio parts
I send you.

Future For Trained Men Is Bright in Radio, Television, Electronics

The Radio Repair business is booming NOW. There is good money fixing Radios in your spare time or even full time business. Trained Radio Technicians also find wide-open opportunities in Police, Aviation, Marine Radio, in Broadcasting, Radio Manufacturing, Public Address work, etc. Think of the boom coming now that new Radios can be made! Think of even greater opportunities when Television and Electronics are available to the public!

Many Beginners Soon Make $5, $10 a Week EXTRA in Spare Time

The day you enroll I start sending EXTRA MONEY JOB SHEETS to help you make EXTRA money fixing Radios in spare time while learning. You LEARN Radio principles from my easy-to-grasp Lessons—PRACTICE what you learn by building real Radio Circuits with Radio parts I send—USE your knowledge to make EXTRA money in spare time.

Mail Coupon For Free Copy of Lesson and 64-Page Illustrated Book

I will send you FREE a sample lesson, "Getting Acquainted with Receiver Servicing," to show you how practical it is to train for Radio in spare time. With it I'll send my 64-page, illustrated book, "Win Rich Rewards in Radio." Just mail coupon in an envelope or paste it on a penny postal. J. E. SMITH, President, Dist. 6F09, National Radio Institute, Pioneer Home
Study Radio School, Washington 5, D. C.

My Course Includes Training in TELEVISION • ELECTRONICS

You build this MEASURING IN-STRUMENT yourself early in the course—use it for practical Radio work on neighborhood Radios to pick up EXTRA spare time money!

You build this SUPER-HETERODYNE CIRCUIT that brings in local and distant stations. You get practical experience putting this set through fascinating tests!

BE A SUCCESS in RADIO I Will Train You at Home

Sample Lesson FREE

Give hints on Receiver Servicing, Locating Defects, Repair of Loudspeaker, I. F. Transformer, Gang Tuner, Condenser, etc., 51 illustrations. Study it—keep it—use it—without obligation!
Mail Coupon NOW for your copy!

GET BOTH 64 PAGE BOOK
SAMPLE LESSON FREE

MR. J. E. SMITH, President, Dist. 6F09
National Radio Institute, Washington 5, D. C.
Mail me FREE, without obligation, Sample Lesson and 64-page book about how to win success in Radio and Television—Electronics. (No salesman will call.
Please write plainly.)

Name _____ Age _____
Address _____
City _____ Zone _____ State _____ 475
() If you are a war veteran, check here.

HOLA, everybody! Sure is fine to see you all gatherin' around this old brandin' fire once again. Squat you down comfortable like and roll a smoke from yore makin's, or toss down a saddle and use it for a pillow when you've stretched yore length on the ground for a rest.

While the coffee boils in the pot and barbecue drips on the coals, I'm gonna tell you somethin' o' early Tucson, the Shoo Fly Restaurant, and Colonel Jack Long's famous deevorce from his wife.

The now-thrivin' and beautiful city o' Tucson, Arizona, didn't grow so fast in the early days o' its existence, though many things were favorable to its development.

It lies in the fertile valley o' the Santa Cruz, a mile and a half wide valley where grains, fruits, and vegetables grows in rich abundance, and in frontier days was the capital o' the Territory o' Arizona.

Constant War

But the Apaches, unrelentin' in their hostilities, waged constant war and depredations, sort of scarin' the town out o' its growth, you might say.

Tucson was no Sunday School picnic, but it warn't never the rip-roarin' heldorado that was Tombstone, Abilene, Dodge City and others.

It's true the 'dobe village had its moments o' deadly brawls, quick draws, and sudden death. It was here that Wyatt Earp wound up the gang what killed his brother Morgan, finishin' off Frank Stillwell in the railroad yards, bearin' down on him with a Wells-Fargo shotgun.

Earp next got Indian Charley, though he gave the outlaw 'til he (Earp) had counted three to draw his gun. Then come that young Johnny-Behind-the-Deuce, who was dyin' to answer for Morgan Earp's killin'.

The old village o' Tucson was more peaceful, somewhat more respectable than most, the Shoo Fly Restaurant bein' as pop'lar as the famous old saloons—the Quartz Rock, the Hanging Wall, the Golden West, and many others.

Constant wagon trains hauled by patient oxen or quick-movin' mules, and "carretas" drawn by the donkey or "burro" from Sonora constantly moved in and out o' the old Plaza by day and camped there at night.

Prairie Schooners

Great prairie schooners from the Missouri River rolled often to the warehouses o' Lord & Williams, Tully, Ochoa & De Long, Leopold Carillo, and others to unload their cargoes.

There wasn't any streets and pavements, lamps were unheard of, and water was hauled in from a distance.

There were garbage dumps littered with old tin cans all over the village, and rubbish piles that had been left undisturbed so long a stranger was apt to be given directions from one part o' Tucson to another by their positions.

"You want to find the Governor's house?" a citizen would ask. "Wa'l, podner, jest keep right on down that a-way past the Palace saloon 'til you gets to the second rubbish pile on yore right, then turn to yore left. . . . You can't miss it."

Time Didn't Matter

There was watches and a few clocks in the town, and some Americans went to the trouble to consult 'em at intervals, but such cursed inventions o' Satan had no influence

(Continued on page 8)

HOW'S YOUR POST-WAR PROGRESS?

• Remember when you were going to prepare for the period of post-war opportunities? This is it! New industries are coming into being, established industries are expanding . . . and there are rewarding openings for trained men in all lines.

• If you failed to get ready for them, it still isn't too late to do something about it! You don't have to slip back . . . you don't have to content yourself with merely hanging to the same old job. The famous International Correspondence Schools can help you to catch up with the procession.

• But don't delay again . . . or it may be too late. Mail the coupon today for full information on I. C. S. training in the field of your interests. Thousands of leaders in American business and industry started up the ladder of success in just that way. It can be the beginning of your climb to higher pay and a more responsible position.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS

BOX 3969-F, SCRANTON 9, PENNA.

Without cost or obligation, please send me full particulars about the course before which I have marked X:

Air Conditioning and Plumbing Courses

- ☐ Air Conditioning
☐ Heating ☐ Plumbing
☐ Refrigeration ☐ Steam Fitting
Chemistry Courses
☐ Chemical Engineering ☐ Chemistry, Analytical ☐ Chemistry, Industrial ☐ Chemistry, Mfg. Iron & Steel
☐ Petroleum Refining ☐ Plastics
☐ Pulp and Paper Making
Civil Engineering, Architectural and Mining Courses ☐ Architectural Drafting ☐ Architecture
☐ Bridge and Building Foreman
☐ Building Estimating
☐ Civil Engineering
☐ Coal Mining
☐ Contracting and Building
☐ Highway Engineering
☐ Lumber Dealer
☐ Reading Structural Blueprints
☐ Sanitary Engineering
☐ Structural Drafting

- ☐ Structural Engineering
☐ Surveying and Mapping
Communications Courses
☐ Electronics
☐ Fractional Telegraphy
☐ Radio, General
☐ Radio Operating ☐ Radio Servicing ☐ Telegraph Engineering
Electrical Courses
☐ Electrical Drafting ☐ Electrical Engineering
☐ Electric Light and Power
☐ Lighting Technician
☐ Practical Electrician
Internal Combustion Engines Courses
☐ Auto Technician ☐ Aviation
☐ Diesel-Electric
☐ Diesel Engine ☐ Gas Engine
Mechanical Courses
☐ Aeronautical Engineering
☐ Aircraft Drafting ☐ Flight Engineer
☐ Foundry Work
☐ Heat Treatment of Metals

- ☐ Industrial Engineering ☐ Industrial Metallurgy ☐ Machine Shop
☐ Mechanical Drafting ☐ Mechanical Engineering
☐ Mold-Loft Work
☐ Patternmaking—Wood, Metal
☐ Reading Shop Blueprints
☐ Sheet-Metal Drafting ☐ Sheet-Metal Worker
☐ Ship Drafting ☐ Ship Fitting
☐ Tool Designing ☐ Toolmaking
☐ Welding—Gas and Electric Railroad Courses
☐ Air Brake ☐ Car Inspector
☐ Diesel Locomotive ☐ Locomotive Engineer
☐ Locomotive Fireman
☐ Railroad Section Foreman
Steam Engineering Courses
☐ Boilermaking
☐ Combustion Engineering
☐ Engine Running
☐ Marine Engineering
☐ Steam Electric ☐ Steam Engine

Textile Courses

- ☐ Cotton Manufacturing
☐ Rayon Weaving
☐ Textile Designing
☐ Woollen Manufacturing
Business and Academic Courses ☐ Accounting ☐ Advertising ☐ Arithmetic ☐ Bookkeeping ☐ Business Correspondence
☐ Business Management
☐ Certified Public Accounting ☐ Commercial ☐ Cost Accounting
☐ Federal Tax
☐ First Year College
☐ Foremanship ☐ French
☐ Good English ☐ High School
☐ Higher Mathematics ☐ Illustrating ☐ Motor Traffic
☐ Postal Service
☐ Salesmanship ☐ Secretarial
☐ Sign Lettering
☐ Spanish ☐ Stenography
☐ Traffic Management

Name..... Age..... Address.....
City..... State..... Position..... How..... A.M. to..... P.M.

Canadian residents send coupon to International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Ltd., Montreal, Canada.
British residents send coupon to I. C. S., 71 Kingsway, London, W. O. 2, England.

A DISCOUNT TO DISCHARGED VETERANS—SPECIAL TUITION RATES FOR MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Start Your Own Service Shop
WITH LITTLE MONEY

NEW BOOK TELLS YOU HOW

Only $1.75 Postpaid

ELECTRICAL & RADIO BUSINESS

10 Days' FREE Trial

Get this sensational new book, "Starting and Operating a Profitable Electrical or Radio Shop" on 10 days' FREE TRIAL. Full facts about starting with small capital, full or part time. Tells how to finance a business, choosing a location, selecting a name, how and what to buy, advertising, salesmanship, legal angles, record keeping. Brand new—nothing like it. Recommended for servicemen, or anyone seeking information on starting a good paying shop. Only $1.75 postpaid. Order your copy of "Starting and Operating a Profitable Electrical or Radio Shop" today.

RUSH THIS 10 DAY FREE TRIAL COUPON

H. C. LEWIS, President
COYNE ELECTRICAL SCHOOL, Dept. 86-76
500 S. PAULINA ST., CHICAGO 12, ILL.
O.K.—rush my copy of "Starting and Operating a Profitable Electrical or Radio Shop." I am enclosing $1.75 remittance (Coyne pays postage). I understand I may return book in 10 days for full refund if I'm not entirely pleased.

NAME _____ AGE _____
ADDRESS _____ ZONE _____
CITY _____ STATE _____
☐ Check: Please if you prefer to have book sent O. O. D. For cash check R. M. only (O.O.D. for those countries). Same 10 DAY SATISFACTION GUARANTEE.

GENUINE PRE-WAR QUALITY

FIREWORKS!

OH-BOY

Banner has always been right there with the newest and best in fireworks. Now we give you JET PROFLUSION...an amazing rocket plane that can be used over and over again. Write quick for details of this newest sensation in fireworks. It's astounding. It's colossal.

BIG SPECIAL OFFER $4.95

Giant assortment of over 150 pieces, including 3-5 inch star shells, aerial bombs, flower pots, skyrocketers, battle-in-the-clouds, Roman candles, tubular salutes, and many others...regular $9.95, retail value for only $4.95. Rush your order. Quantity limited. Catalog FREE.

BANNER FIREWORKS MFG. CO., INC.
DEPT. 352 TOLEDO 12, OHIO

If Ruptured Try This Out

Modern Protection Provides Great Comfort and Holding Security

Without Tortuous Truss Wearing

An "eye-opening" revelation in sensible and comfortable reliable rupture protection may be yours for the asking...without cost or obligation. Simply send name and address to William S. Rice, Inc., Dept. 1-W, Adams, N. Y., and full details of the new and different Rice Method will be sent you free. Without hard flesh-gauging pads or tormenting pressure, here's a Support that has brought joy and comfort to thousands—by releasing them from Trusses with springs and straps that bind and cut. Designed to securely hold a rupture up and in where it belongs and yet give freedom of body and genuine comfort. For full information—write today!

AROUND THE BRANDING FIRE

(Continued from page 6)

on man, woman, or child o' the native population.

The divisions o' the day were regulated by the bells which changed periodically in front o' the cathedral.

When they rang out their peal for early mass the little world o' Tucson rose up, stretched itself, and made ready for the day, though the clocks o' the Gringo might've sounded their alarm two hours before. When the Angelus sounded at midday, all made ready for the noon meal and the invariable siesta that followed.

And as vespers tolled at evenin', adobes dropped from listless hands of workmen, and docile Papago Indians, wrappin' themselves in their pieces o' "manta" or old "rebosos," turned their faces southward, mindful of the curfew signal learned from the early missionaries.

The Shoo Fly

The isolated, desert town had its typical saloon life, but it also had a mighty respectable restaurant at which to point with pride. The Shoo Fly, so named, they say, because the flies wouldn't shoo worth a cent, although the proprietress employed muchachos to slash at them with leafy brushes throughout all meals.

The Shoo Fly Restaurant was run by a woman, a Mrs. Wallen, but unlike most respectable eatin' houses, the proprietress was not a widow.

It's said she had a husband, though he was mostly seen flittin' about the corrals feedin' the chickens, or in the kitchen peelin' tomatoes or some such. Not bein' a widow was hardly any handicap at all to Mrs. Wallen as her will was law, and she not only set a table that groaned with the best that was to be had in the desert country; she collected from one and all in advance, without any hesitation or trouble.

Among her patrons were the federal officials, the Governor, the Judge, and one Jack Long. He was spoke of as "Colonel" Jack Long, a title a newspaper had bestowed upon him, and infrequently he was called "Jedge," a title Jack Long would have none of for the reason that the title wasn't always a title o' respect on the frontier.

He had made a fortune in gold in California, but had lost it before comin' to Tucson, due, partly, to his mistake in choosin' a wife.

Not his first wife. In his early minin' days he had taken a wife from the Rogue River tribe, the daughter o' the famous chief, Cutmouth John, and they lived in peace together

(Continued on page 10)

IMAGINE THEIR JOY WHEN THEY FOUND THEY COULD PLAY This easy as A.B.C. way!

LEARNED QUICKLY AT HOME

"I didn't dream I could actually learn to play without a teacher. Now, when I play for people they hardly believe that I learned to play so well in so short a time."

*H. C. S., Calif.

INVESTMENT PAID BACK A THOUSAND FOLD

"Anyone with musical ability should make good with your course. My little investment paid back a thousand fold. I have been playing for 4 years now. Today I play in one of our top bands."

*J.M., San Juan, P.R.

PLAYS AT DANCES

"I have completed your course and your lessons have been most satisfactory. I can play all of the popular songs. I have also earned money playing at dances."

*N. J., New York.

PLAYS ON RADIO

"As a proud student I can't keep from telling you that as a result of my course I have a good position playing from KTRB, Hot Springs, Ark., every morning."

*J. S., Okla.

INVITED TO PARTIES

"I enjoyed taking this course and I get a lot of pleasure out of it. I have made much progress and have many invitations to play at parties. I owe you much for making this possible."

*E.U., N.Y.

Thousands Have Learned to Play for Less Than 7c a Day

WHAT instrument would you like to play? We'll show you how you can learn to play it—quickly, easily, in spare time at home for less than SEVEN CENTS A DAY! Never mind if you don't know one note of music from another—don't worry about "special talent."

The truth of the matter is that thousands now play who never thought they could! Yes, men and women everywhere are enjoying the thrilling satisfaction of playing the piano, violin, guitar, saxophone or other favorite instrument. Some of them are playing in orchestras and over the radio; others are teaching music, making money in spare or full time. And thousands are playing for their own enjoyment and the entertainment of their friends.

It all came about when they wrote to the U. S. School of Music for the Free Booklet that shows you how EASY it is to learn music at home this modern way. No tedious scales, no tiresome exercises. You learn to play by playing—start right in almost at once with the melody of a simple tune! It takes only a few minutes a day and the cost is trifling: you save the expense of a private teacher. Does it sound too good to be true? Mail the coupon and get the FREE PROOF! (Our forty-eighth year—Est. 1898.) U. S. School of Music, 2946 Brunswick Bldg., New York 10, N. Y.

NOTICE

Please do not confuse the U. S. School of Music method with any system of teaching music "by ear" or by trick charts. Our method teaches you to play by actual notes . . . not by any "trick" or number system. You are able to pick up any piece of regular sheet music and play by notes. And once you've learned to play by note it's just like learning your A-B-C's. It never leaves you—you remember it for life.

SEND TODAY FOR COMPLETE DETAILS

● You'll open your eyes when you find how quickly and easily you can learn to play your favorite instrument. Don't doubt; don't hesitate. Send for the fascinating illustrated booklet that answers all your questions; let the free Print and Picture Sample show you how this method actually works. If interested, mail the coupon NOW.

*Actual pupils' names on request. Pictures by professional models.

FREE! Print and Picture Sample

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC 2946 Brunswick Bldg., New York 10, N. Y.

I am interested in music study, particularly in the instrument checked below. Please send me your free illustrated booklet, "How to Learn Music at Home."

<input type="checkbox"/> Piano	<input type="checkbox"/> Saxophone	<input type="checkbox"/> Modern Elementary
<input type="checkbox"/> Guitar	<input type="checkbox"/> Trumpet, Cornet	<input type="checkbox"/> Harmony
<input type="checkbox"/> Hawaiian Guitar	<input type="checkbox"/> Reed Organ	<input type="checkbox"/> Clarinet
<input type="checkbox"/> Violin	<input type="checkbox"/> Tenor Sax	<input type="checkbox"/> Practical Finger
<input type="checkbox"/> Piano Accordion	<input type="checkbox"/> Mandolin	<input type="checkbox"/> Other Instrument

Have you instrument?.....

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

NOTE: If you are under 18 years parent must sign coupon.

Save 2c—Stick coupon on penny postcard.

BOOKS ON APPROVAL

SEND NO MONEY. Just mail the coupon for a complete set of Six Big Auto Books, 20th Edition. Whether you are a mechanic or helper, expert or apprentice, auto owner or driver, take immediate advantage of this FREE EXAMINATION OFFER.

MAKE GOOD MONEY NOW HOLD A PERMANENT JOB
America wants its automobiles kept in good repair. Men with "know how" are in demand, at big pay. These books will help you get and hold an important job, or give you a chance to go into business for yourself now or later. Any man who half tries to improve himself can learn auto servicing and repairing by this quick reference method. Use the JIFFY INDEX to find easily understood answer to any auto problem. These wonder books prepared by eleven of America's great automobile engineers. Many hundreds of valuable illustrations. Send the coupon TODAY.

CAN YOU FIX IT?
These wonder books tell step by step HOW to make difficult repairs and adjustments, how to keep a car at maximum efficiency, including latest improvements in car design and operation. Engine troubles and how to correct them will be covered.

6 BIG VOLUMES
2800 pages, 2000 illustrations, wiring diagrams, etc., including Diesel engines. Beautiful modernistic, washable cloth binding.

AMERICAN TECHNICAL SOCIETY, Dept. Dept. AAA
Branch Ave. at 86th St., Chicago 37, Ill.
I would like to examine your Six-Volume Set of Auto Books. I will send you the delivery charges only, but if I choose I may return them express collect. If after 10 days I give you no word, I will send you $2 and pay the balance at the rate of only $3 a month until $24.80 has been paid. Please include consulting service as offered above.

Name
Address
City State
Please attach letter stating age, occupation, employer's name and address, and name and address of at least one business man as reference. Men in service, also please give home address.

INVENTORS

Learn now—without obligation—how to protect and sell your invention. Secure Free "Patent Guide," containing complete information about patent procedure and selling inventions. Write
CLARENCE A. O'BRIEN & HARVEY JACOBSON
Registered Patent Attorneys
68-E Adams Building • Washington 5, D. C.

POCKET WATCHES

SWISS MOVEMENTS

Now available "EXPERT" watches. Swiss made watches are known the world over for their accurate time-keeping and quality construction because they are made by master watch craftsmen. This handsome men's pocket watch has a sturdy-constructed chrome case and even secure dial. A timepiece you will be proud to own. SEND NO MONEY. Simply pay postman $8.50 plus 15% tax. Wear 10 days on our money back if not satisfied guarantee. United Products Co., 7750 S. Halsted, Dept. P-108, Chicago 20, Ill.

WORLD'S LARGEST DENTAL MAKERS Now

FALSE TEETH

On 60 Days' Trial!
From Our Laboratory Direct to You!
Dental Plates made to measure—individually—by MAIL.
Take oral impression at home. Over 100,000 men & women wear teeth remade.

MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE!

SEND NO MONEY!
FREE Impression Material, Information, Catalog, Low Prices.
UNITED STATES DENTAL CO.
1555 MILWAUKEE AVE., DEPT. 6-82, CHICAGO, ILL.

AROUND THE BRANDING FIRE

(Continued from page 8)

until the tribe went to war with the whites. Jack Long's wife left him and went back to her own people, leavin' him easy prey for a lady from Missouri.

He Struck It Rich

In the meantime Jack and his podners had struck it rich. Upon the change in fortune Jack made a change in his personal appearance.

He promptly arrayed himself in the whitest o' "biled" shirts, in the bosom o' which he stuck a big, diamond-cluster pin, the biggest he could buy in Sacramento.

On the warty finger of his right hand sparkled another stone, and from a heavy chain there was suspended a heavy gold watch, big as a saucer, and a bunch o' keys.

Strollin' up to the bar he'd say, "Gents, what'll you have? It's mine this time, bar-keep," and he'd lay down a twenty-dollar bill and spurn the change.

The newspaper what labeled him "Colonel" was urg'n' him to accept a nomination for Congress, and Jack probably would've done so, for he had the pride and the spirit for such a job, had not fickle fortune turned her back on him at that point.

The Wife From Missouri

From all accounts, the wife from Missouri was a suitable mate for him. Trouble was that the lady spent money as free or freer than Jack did. She didn't slow down none when Jack urged that the money was runnin' low in his pockets. Arguments, then quarrels followed.

At last Mrs. Long proposed that Jack give her half his money and a divorce. She'd go away and leave him alone, she promised.

Colonel Jack Long consented with alacrity and considerable fury.

Half of Everything—and How!

Now his wealth consisted of the sum of two hundred dollars, less than the lady had suspected. From that amount he deducted a double eagle, set it aside, not sayin' at the moment for what purpose, then divided the remainder of the two hundred into two equal parts.

When he'd finished that job he seized a pair of his trousers from his wardrobe which stood open in the room, and tore them leg from leg, throwing the two pieces on separate piles. Promptly coats, waistcoats, and undergar-

(Continued on page 106)

BIG MONEY INDEPENDENCE
*A PROFITABLE LIFETIME
BUSINESS OF YOUR OWN!*

LEARN ELECTRICAL APPLIANCE REPAIRING

PREPARE NOW FOR THE FUTURE

If now employed, start your home appliance repair business NOW in your spare time and be set with a business of your own no matter what happens. You don't need elaborate fixtures or expensive equipment, vacant store, etc. Work as many hours as you wish—the home appliance repairman is his own boss. It is a profitable occupation, for on many types of repairs it is not unusual for a repairman to charge on the basis of $5.00 to $6.00 per hour. Don't gamble with your future—learn a trade that will always support you. Remember, as long as electrical appliances are used, there will be a need for electrical appliance repairmen.

If you are at all mechanically inclined—can hold and use tools—then you have all of the qualifications required for becoming a big money earning home appliance repairman. It does not matter if you have not had a great deal of schooling or had previous experience along these lines—WE WILL TEACH YOU. Age should be no barrier—nor should any minor physical handicap.

New Course Tells All

Profusely illustrated, our new course shows you in simple, easy to understand language and drawings how to make each repair on refrigerators, vacuum cleaners, washing machines, motors, etc. Explains and gives you a working knowledge of electricity, welding, nickel plating, etc. Shows you how to build the power tools you need and how to solicit and keep business coming to you. Not a theory course but an honest to goodness course written by and used by repairmen the country over. Price of course is so low that the savings on your own household appliance repairs will quickly pay for it. Act now! Mail the handy coupon below today.

« Read What Our Students Say About Course » »

I really believe your course the best investment a mechanically minded man can make.—Clarence E. Allen, Indianapolis, Ind. I have received your Course in Appliance Repairing and I must say I am well pleased with same. I am only sorry I did not have said Course some years ago. I have learned so much more through this course I would not part with it.—Charles Schwartz, Hamilton, Ohio

The Course in Appliance Servicing arrived a few days ago. Want to take out a few minutes of my valuable time to let you know that this is just what I have been looking for ever since I opened up my Fix-it shop. I must admit that you told the truth when you said that it contains quite a bit more information than I bargained for.—P. J. Brel, Sebring, Ohio

I am a mechanic for the Western Union Telegraph Co. Three days after receiving the lessons in refrigeration I earned the exact cost of the course.—Henry B. Lee, Washington, D. C.

I work day times at the shipyard and after 4:00 P.M. I operate from my cellar and average $10.00 to $15.00 clear every day.—Walter Nash, Brockton, Mass.

GET STARTED TODAY — Mail This Coupon

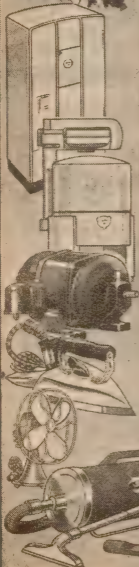

CHRISTY SUPPLY CO.
2835 N. Central Ave., Dept. D-1504
Chicago 34, Illinois

Please send me free illustrated literature about America's Fastest Growing Industry — ELECTRICAL APPLIANCE REPAIRING.

Name

Address

City State

HERE COME THE DEMBROWS!

HATED!

HUNTED!

FEARED!

in TECHNICOLOR!

COLUMBIA PICTURES
presents

"Sure, my man's a Dembrow
...and I'd follow him..."

RENEGADES

with
EVELYN WILLARD
KEYES · PARKER

LARRY EDGAR
PARKS · BUCHANAN

Screenplay by Melvin Levy and Francis Edwards Faragoh Produced by MICHEL KRAIKE Directed by GEORGE SHERMAN

*A Glamorous
Novelet*

"Howdy," a quiet voice said to Adele and Adams.

Adele Ropes a Rainbow

By THELMA KNOLES

Mark Blair thought she was too fragile a flower to be a rancher's wife—but Adele could dream of nothing better than sharing the hardships of life in Lost Valley with him!

CHAPTER I

The Princess Comes Home

FOR the full two weeks since old Sam Carey's daughter, Adele, had come back from a select finishing school in the East the Diamond C had worn a festive air. It showed in the broad grins on every waddy's face, in the spruced-up look of ranchhouse and barn and corral. And it beamed from Sam Carey's proud countenance as he sat with his daughter on the veranda, both of them gazing contentedly across the rolling miles of their cattle kingdom.

Adele was worth beaming over, with her pale gold hair shining in the lowering sun, with her dusky, twilight-blue eyes and her skin the rich, satiny cream color of yucca blossoms—though she'd often complained because she wouldn't tan properly. She had always been as tiny and trim as a French wax doll, but now there was a sureness and poise in her manner that mightily pleased old Sam.

"Mark Blair ought to be showing up any time," he remarked. "I hope he gets Davis Adams to put that bridge over Thunder Gorge. It'd be the making of Mark's ranch."

Adele smiled. There was a purposeful gleam in her lovely eyes. Because Mark Blair was due at the ranch was the reason she was wearing her most becoming dress—an artfully simple little thing of soft, clinging white lawn, finished at the neck and sleeves with rows of Mexican drawn-work that cast lacy shadows on the creamy skin showing through.

"I'll be glad to see Mark," she murmured.

She had unfinished business with that tall, rangy, mule-stubborn young rancher. She thought with a rueful quirk of her luscious red lips how heartbroken she'd been when her father sent her away two years ago. How she couldn't eat or sleep for thinking of Mark Blair.

How different it would be now! She couldn't wait to meet him, to see the way his direct gray eyes would darken and then narrow when something caught his interest, and how he ran his square, hard hand through the sunburned brown hair that swirled into a stubborn cowlick over one straight, dark brow. Adele meant to catch his interest all right.

She'd learned a lot in the two years she'd been away from the Diamond C. She'd learned that an elusive dimple at the corner of her mouth could pack a greater wallop than a pearl-handled six-shooter if maneuvered right. She'd learned how to say no with her lips and yes with her eyes. Smarting over the way Mark Blair brushed her off in a big-brotherly manner Adele made a game of collecting masculine hearts.

NOT that she didn't hand the hearts back none the worse for wear, with a sweetness and kindness that was sincere. But she could have kept them if she'd wished. All that had been practice toward the time when she could send a humbled Mark Blair back to his precious Lost Valley ranch. Then her score with him would be even, and Adele Carey would go on her merry way free of a girlish infatuation.

Sam went into his office. Adele remained on the veranda, looking across the range. The road led in a series of loops to Thunder Mountain where lightning flashed blue over towering peaks. The early evening shadows were lengthening fast across the valley, blurring the gray-green of greasewood and sage into softer tones, and the expectant glow was fading from Adele's eyes when a lone rider finally came into sight.

She went down the veranda steps toward the hitching rack, moving faster and faster till her dainty slippers barely skimmed the graveled walk. There were white roses blooming there, she remembered now, and they would look very lovely on the supper table.

Adele heard the muffled beat of hoofs in the thick dust of the lane as she reached the hitching rack, and the sound kept pace with the rhythm of her own thudding heart. She reached for a cluster of roses, pulled it toward her and buried her face in the cool, fragrant petals, trying to control the trembling which shook her, trying to steady her mouth and compose her face before she greeted Mark.

It would never, never do to let him see the hot color in her cheeks, the wildly fluttering pulse at her throat, the radiance she knew blazed from her eyes. Seemingly oblivious of everything but the flowers she began picking some of the longer-stemmed blooms.

"Howdy, Miss White Rose," said a man's appreciative voice.

Adele turned with a light step.

"Good evening!" she said and then in surprise, "Why, it's Mark Blair!"

All the time her senses were so swimming in excitement that the tall, broad-shouldered man moving toward her was surrounded by a hazy blur. She must not, she must not dash madly toward him as an ecstatic kid of seventeen had once done. She must not let her voice tremble so.

"Blair?" The man's voice cut through the blur. "Sorry, but—"

Adele blinked. The blur cleared and she faced the laughing blue eyes of a complete stranger—a tall man in good riding clothes, holding an expensive Stetson in one hand, and with the slanting sun polishing his fair hair.

"This is the Diamond C, isn't it?" he asked. "I rode out from the stage station. I'm Davis Adams, the engineer."

Adele nodded. The let down was so sharp that she felt the ground rocking under her feet. She flung back one hand to steady herself against the post, disappointment sweeping over her.

"Oh!" she cried. "Ouch!" and snatched her hand back. "Those roses," she muttered, "are thornier than a cholla."

Davis Adams promptly whisked out an immaculate handkerchief, took her wrist in a gentle but masterful grip, and dabbed at the scratch marring its pearly perfection. Automatically Adele tilted her head back and smiled up at him, playing the game she'd learned so well the past two years.

"Howdy," a quiet voice spoke behind them.

Adele spun about. A rangy cowboy in dusty jeans and a blue cotton shirt plastered to his powerful shoulders, was gravely regarding them from the saddle of a travel-weary roan.

"Mark!" she cried. The color rushed into her face as she looked up, meeting the level gray glance she remembered so well. "I—I—We've been looking for you all afternoon!"

"Honest?" asked Mark. His glance went past her to Davis Adams an ironical expression on his face. "That's right sweet of you, Adele."

He swung to the ground, tossed his reins over his arm. Breathlessly Adele introduced the two men, explaining that Davis Adams was the engineer who'd come to see about the bridge over Thunder Gorge. And all the time she was hungrily staring at Mark, was drinking in the solid strength of him, the long-limbed grace and sureness of his every move.

They walked up to the barn and there Adele turned to the engineer.

"The boys here can take care of your horse, Mr. Adams," she said. "Dad's up at the house, in his office."

Unsaddling the roan, Mark gave the stranger a friendly nod and then stood with Adele, watching the other man stride toward the house.

"I hear Adams is one of the best construction engineers in the country," Mark said.

"He must be," Adele agreed, trying to speak naturally through the excitement that gripped her. "Dad says that if anyone can put a real bridge over Thunder Gorge it'll be he—if he decides to do it."

"And thereon hangs my future," Mark stated.

FOR a moment his mouth tightened and a determined expression came into his eyes. Then he shook off his sober mood. He looked at Adele, really looked at her, taking her in from shining yellow hair to trim little slippers. Adele put aside the roses she had picked, saving a half-opened bud which she tucked in her hair.

"Ummm," Mark said as he gazed at her. "Our wild little colt's come home a high-steppin' beauty for sure."

He turned to the smiling Mexican boy who appeared from inside the barn.

"Give Frosty a rubdown, will you, Pedro?"

"Si, Senor."

Whistling, Pedro led the horse away, and Adele and Mark were alone in the doorway of the big, shadowy barn. Long bars of sunlight fell between them, swirling with golden dust particles. The scent of the rosebud in Adele's hair was overwhelmingly sweet. Off toward Thunder Mountain a rainbow's vivid arc appeared, and to Adele it seemed a radiant symbol of promised happiness.

She moved closer to Mark. Her heart was pounding painfully in her breast, threatening to suffocate her. She forced her lovely mouth into a tantalizing smile—a smile that made the best use of that elusive dimple. A little breeze stirred the soft, fair hair framing her face, ruffled its sleekness into blowing silk tassels.

"Mark," she whispered, and her eyes were dusky blue stars. "I'm so glad to be back."

His hands on her shoulders tightened. He stared deep into her eyes, and she recognized with a breath-taking lunge of her heart, the light that burned in the gray depths of his.

"The same—sweet—little kid," he said jerkily, almost protestingly. "So help me—you haven't changed a bit." His breath was a long-drawn, ragged sigh and Adele thought, but couldn't be sure, that he added, "And neither have I, darn it."

She couldn't be sure of anything as sane as words when her senses were whirling away on a shimmering rainbow trail, and she had no more poise or control than one of the spiraling dust motes in the sun. Then everything came to focus in the touch of Mark's lips to hers, in the kiss that was the essence of all her girlhood dreams, of vague imaginings brought to warm, sweet life and held there like a point of flame between them.

The flame dissolved and she was clinging tightly to him, feeling the strong, uneven beat of his heart, feeling his hand touching her hair.

"Mark," she said softly, "why did you let me leave not knowing you felt this way? Why didn't you tell me long ago?"

His hand stilled on her hair. His whole big, solid body went rigid. Adele pushed away from him, looked up into his face. Her heart caught anew at the dear familiarity, the direct gray eyes under the heavy dark brows. With a little half-sob she reached up to smooth back the cowlick of sun-streaked brown hair swirling toward one eye.

He caught her hand, held it in a grip that was suddenly savage.

"Because you don't belong in Lost Valley, Adele Carey, any more than a butterfly belongs in—in a bear's den."

"But—but—" Adele gasped, "don't you love me? Isn't that what you've been saying?"

"That has nothing to do with your living in Lost Valley," Mark ground out. "And well I've always known it. And managed to keep it to myself till I lost my head a minute ago." His eyes were narrowed and dark now. "It was seeing you with that engineer that knocked me off balance—and the way you smiled up at me—and the way I've missed you this past two years."

Adele's smile trembled through tears of joy and relief. Now she could admit that she'd never stopped adoring Mark Blair, not for a minute. Nor had she ever stopped longing for him to return her love. She felt that she'd reached the rainbow's end of her dreams.

CHAPTER II

Far Away Paradise

DURING the next two days Adele discovered that her problems weren't so easily solved. She didn't even get to talk to Mark alone again till the second afternoon when she found him waiting for Davis Adams in her father's office. She stated directly that she'd never even seen his Lost Valley Ranch.

Mark replied flatly that there was no place for company there. He pointed out the fact that during the rainy summer season the only way in and out of the mountain-circled basin was over Thunder Gorge. And, he added grimly, the rickety old make-shift bridge that now swung over the gorge would probably wash out any time.

"The rest of the ranchers in the Thunder Mountain country can use the long road around the spur of the mountains," he explained, "during the rainy season when Pinnacle Pass can't be traveled. But in order to even reach the road from my spread I have to cross the gorge."

"But," Adele said reasonably, "that's what Davis Adams is here for, isn't it? To see about building a good bridge over the gorge, and then a road up over the pass that'll be open all year around?"

"Yep," Mark agreed. "All I have to do is convince Adams that the bridge can be built, and that it will save the ranchers thousands of dollars every year to have a dependable way through the pass."

He shoved his hands deep into the pockets of his levis and stared out the window at the distant Thunder Mountain range, cutting a blue silhouette across the cloud strewn sky. Adele wondered if he'd really put that kiss out of his mind as he appeared to have done. How could he talk about bridges when she was so burningly conscious of his nearness?

She gave a wistful little sigh.

"Mark," she said softly, daringly, "I wouldn't mind being marooned in Lost Valley—with you."

He looked straight at her then, and she saw that he hadn't forgotten. That his eyes were smouldering with emotion, were dark and intense with bitterness. His laughter broke on a harsh edge.

"Del," he said sharply, "don't be a little fool. Look at what you've been used to. And that school where you've spent the past two years. You just don't know what you're talking about."

"All that doesn't matter to me," she interrupted quickly. "I—I was getting to be such a tomboy was why Dad sent me away—"

He ignored the interruption. "Honey-child, I haven't even had water piped into my shack yet. Everything's had to go into building up the stock, first. Aunt Debbie gets along, but she came out here in a

"Where did you ride this afternoon when you rushed away?" Mark demanded

covered wagon and still thinks it's plain luxury not to have to fight Indians all the time."

"I'd like to know Aunt Debbie," Adele said stubbornly. "I'd like to make her a long visit."

Her lip trembled childishly and she bit down on it hard. How could he be so blind? How could he think plumbing could be more important to her than being with the man she loved? A tear hung on her lashes, splashed down her cheek. She was too proud to admit it was there by wiping it away.

"Oh, lord help me," muttered Mark wildly.

He reached her in two swift steps, caught her in a rough embrace and pressed her face against his shoulder.

"It's only that I want to keep that—that shining look in your face," he murmured into her hair. "I couldn't bear to see it go out—like a candle in a hard wind, as it sure would if you got a real taste of life in Lost Valley. Can't you savvy? Maybe some-day when the bridge is in, and my herd's built up a little more—"

But Adele wasn't interested in maybe some day. She wanted now. Now with Mark's arms warm and strong around her. With his voice, husky with tenderness murmuring into her hair. She pressed closely into his arms.

"Mark," she said, standing on tip-toe and lifting her face to his, "you write your Aunt Debbie today and tell her I'm coming back with you for a visit. I'll show you whether I can take living in Lost Valley or not." She gave a shaky little giggle. "What if the bridge does go out? We'll cross on a rain-bow. Don't you know," she added softly, "I always manage to get my way, when I'm right?"

There was the sound of footsteps in the hall. By the time Davis Adams came into the office Adele was smoothing her hair in front of the mirror in the moose-horn hat-rack, and Mark was turning the pages of a notebook.

Adele smiled at the engineer. His answering grin was openly admiring. Her dimple danced at the corner of her lips. She couldn't help it. She was so marvelously happy that she loved the whole world. No use to try to dim the sparkle that made star sapphires of her eyes, or to erase the rosy flush in her cheeks.

SHE turned, and her glowing eyes locked glances with Mark's, which more than ever reminded her of clear pools of rain-water caught in the gray granite basins lining the mountain arroyos.

"Remember," she said with breathless significance, "your letter to Aunt Debbie! The mail goes out this afternoon."

He nodded, and a wry little grin tugged at the corners of his lips, a grin of complete surrender. Adele tossed a last flashing smile at both men and left the room. She stood for a moment in the hall for the pure pleasure of listening to Mark's assured voice.

"It'll be a tough one to bridge, but it can be done," Mark was saying. "It'll have to be high, because in order to get the grade down to Mesquite Knob here, you'll have to develop as much distance as possible."

"I figure," Davis Adams said, "that by keeping the alignment on the east side of the creek, taking advantage of some natural embayments at the upper loop—"

Adele went quietly on down the hall. She was back in the office two hours later, putting the outgoing mail into its big leather pouch for Pedro to take down to the box when Mark came in.

"I have a hunch this isn't very smart of me," he said soberly, handing Adele a letter.

"You wait and see," Adele assured him. "You don't have any idea what a good frontier woman I am, Mark Blair."

He laughed. She didn't quite like the tone of that laughter, but she decided to ignore it since she'd had her way. Together they walked out to the verandah and waited till Pedro brought up the heavy mail sack that had just arrived.

"I'm looking for some more signed petitions from the ranchers," Mark declared as Adele spread the mail out on her father's desk. "There—the big envelope from Ed Shannon's Slash Bar."

Adele handed him the heavy envelope with the very round, black handwriting.

"It looks like a girl's writing," she remarked. Her glance darted to the upper left-hand corner. "Who's Josephine Shannon?"

"Reckon Jody handles the correspondence for her dad," Mark explained, ripping the envelope open. A list of signatures fell from the folds of a double page of the same round, clear writing.

"Seems like quite a long business letter," Adele ventured.

Mark looked up. "Jody's relaying all the valley gossip."

And is that all? Adele thought. There were cold prickles along her spine, her nerves tightened, and her senses sharpened as she sensed a threat to her love.

"What's she like? This Jody Shannon?" she asked.

Mark folded the letter and tucked it into his shirt pocket. There was an easy grin on his lips and a reminiscent expression in his eyes.

"Oh, she's a honey," he replied enthusiastically. "Grew up running the range like a young wildcat—can rope and ride and brand as well as any boy. You'll like Jody. Everyone does."

Murderous little thoughts darted through Adele, leaving tiny wounds in their tracks. I hate her, she thought, and was surprised to find that her hands were clenched in the folds of her skirt.

"Is the Shannon spread near Lost Valley?" she asked quite coolly.

"Across the gorge and up some twenty miles," Mark replied cheerfully. "The Shannons moved in right after you left. They're mighty interested in getting this bridge through, too."

Jody Shannon was interested in more than any bridge, Adele thought, seething with hurt and resentment. Mark went out of the office and Adele dropped down into her dad's swivel chair. She stared intently out at Thunder Mountain, not even seeing the shining rainbow it wore like a crown. It was then that she decided that she'd better make her visit to Lost Valley as Mark's announced fiancée, and with his ring on her finger.

She decided to give a dance in honor of Davis Adams. After all, as Mark Blair's future wife it was up to her to help in every way possible. Anything that made a good impression on the engineer, that inclined him favorably toward the ranchers of Thunder Mountain and particularly toward the owner of the Lost Valley spread, might influence his decision about that bridge.

But what Adele was really thinking of was the pink net dress that turned her into an irresistible enchantress—or so she'd been fervently assured. Rows of tiny, glittering sequins bordered the scalloped edges of the skirt, outlined the tight basque waist and the low sweetheart neckline. Sequin splashed roses held her pale gold curls high on her head, to show the creamy curve of her neck flowing into bare, dimpled shoulders.

Surely, Adele thought, floating down the stairway the night of the dance, surrounded by the alluring fragrance of her best French perfume, Mark would be eager to claim her as his fiancée before all their world.

THE house filled with guests arriving early, the girls in party dresses and the ranchers and cowboys in their best silk shirts and polished boots. Adele forgot her own finery at her first glimpse of Mark who arrived late from town. She hadn't known he could be so handsome. He wore a new white shirt and dark trousers and boots that set off his striking, dark good looks. His wayward, tawny brown hair was temporarily pressed back into a crisp wave, giving him an unaccustomed sleek, smooth look.

Adele noted the way the other girls' eyes openly followed him, and for a moment she felt panicky. She'd almost rather have him in his dusty jeans, squinting those direct gray eyes over the lines of a Hereford. But now he was laughing down at the clustering girls, and his smile was flashing as white as his shirt.

She signaled the fiddler to strike up the music. A hand closed possessively on her arm and she turned, ready with a dazzling smile for Mark, ready to go into his arms and show those other girls just where to get off.

But she was looking up into Davis Adams' warm, admiring eyes. With his arm encircling her waist he was leading her onto the floor, though she all but dug her pink satin slipper toes in, holding back. And then she remembered that he was the guest of honor after all, and naturally he expected to dance with her first.

He held her tightly, and she had to twist her head to find Mark through the crowd. Mark was gayly stepping off with the red-headed schoolteacher who was visiting nearby. The sight of that curly red head tucked up against Mark's white-shirted shoulder, his square brown hand along that girl's back as he guided her through the crowd went through Adele like fiery whips.

She tipped her head back to smile up at Davis Adams. Her laughter rang out as light and sweet as chimes on the wind. Her smile was brightly warm and inviting, and she didn't seem to notice that though Mark tried to reach her several times she was danced away before he could break through the crowd surrounding her.

Or was he trying very hard? After all, for a man who'd won steer throwing contests and had ridden some of the toughest broncos in the country, Mark was being pushed back rather easily. For a moment her guard went down and she let out a little, weary sigh.

"Tired?" Davis asked tenderly. "Let's step out for a breath of air."

It was cool on the veranda. Adele went to lean against the railing. Far out in the star-studded darkness was the Thunder Mountain range, rising sharp and black against the sky. Deep within its towering cliffs and upsurging ridges it held a little green basin of a valley—Lost Valley. It seemed as far away as Paradise now. She wondered despairingly if she'd ever really see it. If Jody Shannon was destined to be its mistress.

"Adele," came Davis Adams' low voice at her shoulder. His arm dropped around her. "Adele, you're the most gorgeous thing I ever saw."

She turned quickly, and in that second she glimpsed Mark standing in the doorway. He'd started outside and stopped short. With a little cry Adele broke away from Davis and hurried to the door, but Mark had already disappeared into the crowd.

CHAPTER III

The Heart Learns

LATER Mark came up to claim his belated dance with his hostess.

"Mark," Adele whispered, "what is the matter with you tonight? What are you thinking when you look like that?"

"Plenty," he said quietly, and his gray gaze met hers steadily. Her breath caught on a half-sob, but he didn't seem to notice. "I'm thinking that no one in this whole valley ever saw anything so lovely and—and—shining as you are tonight."

"I'm glad you like my dress," she said uncertainly. "But Mark—"

He spun her about till they stopped in front of a window.

"Look," he said softly, and nodded out at the starry sky. "See Venus queening it up there? You wouldn't try to drag her down to earth, would you?"

"What are you talking about?" Adele gasped, feeling panic like a clutching hand at her throat. "Did you have some mescal in town?"

Mark grinned, but his eyes were stone sober. He looked past her.

"Here comes an hombre who seems mighty anxious to find you," he said.

He nodded at Davis who was hurrying toward them, and then swung away. Adele took a step after him, but stopped when she saw that he was headed straight for the red-headed schoolteacher.

What was wrong? For a wild moment she wondered if Mark was fearful of antagonizing the engineer by seeming to appear as a rival for her attention. But no one knowing Mark Blair could think that.

Adele still didn't understand, and was wondering about it while she sipped coffee in the kitchen late next morning, and absent-mindedly watched the Mexican cook slapping out flat corn cakes for enchiladas, when Pedro brought her Mark's note.

"Adios, Princess," she read. "By the time you open this I'll be headed home. I reckon if that engineer figures the bridge is a good risk he'll build it. And it's time I came down to earth. Seeing you last night so beautiful, and surrounded by all the good things in life—even sashaying around with that dude engineer, cuss him—made me see things straight. Which is that you could never belong in Lost Valley. This'll make you mad for a minute Del. You're plumb used to getting your own way, but you'll get over it. And I reckon I will, too. So, adios, Angel. Mark."

Adele read it swiftly. Then she ran down the hall to her father's office, her satin negligee flying out behind her and the heels of her little silk mules clattering like rapid gunfire.

"Dad—oh, dad!" she cried, flinging herself into his lap.

He took Mark's note from her shaking hand.

"I w-wanted him to be jealous and give me a ring before I went to visit his Aunt Debbie," she sobbed.

Sam Carey read the note. "Reckon," he growled, "that this is where you needed a woman's advice and didn't get it, poor baby. I thought you were prettier'n a strawberry shortcake in that pink dress—enough to turn any man's head. However, let's look at this from Mark's point of view. He's a mighty stubborn, proud young buckaroo—"

"He's j-just plain hard-headed and mean," Adele choked out.

"Del, I figure you scared him off," Sam declared. "You'd a stood more chance hog-tying that wild bronc if you'd a give a barbecue instead of a dance, and if you'd worn yore old levis instead of that fancy dress."

Adele sniffed. "He just doesn't w-want to be engaged. He's afraid for me to come to Lost Valley."

"Ummun," muttered Sam. "Well, suppose you let me look over these papers. Adams was asking me something about those petitions."

Adele got up and walked over to stare blindly into the hatrack mirror.

"I'll be hornswoggled if that loco young fool didn't hightail it off without signing this here paper Adams was asking about special!" her dad roared a moment later.

Adele turned back to the desk.

"Why is it so important that Mark sign anything?" she demanded. "He said Davis knew all the facts now, and he'd either build that bridge or not, and—"

"Facts?" yelled Sam. "What them big companies wants is everything laid out and signed before they'll move a finger. Danged young fool, getting his dander up and tearing off this way." He scowled out the window. "Don't know just who I can send after him, neither, with the round-up just getting under way. Likely what Mark really stamped off back to Lost Valley for, too. Heard him say something about sending a good bunch of yearlings out to market provided he could get them down out of the hills and branded in time."

Adele interrupted him. "Dad, I'm going to take that paper to Mark, so don't waste time arguing about it." She planned excitedly. "It's only a two-day ride and I can stay at Mosely's overnight." She dropped a swift kiss on his head. "Lost Valley, here I come!"

AN HOUR later she was ready to ride, dressed in her old ranch clothes and with her own small pistol holstered around her waist. Her father swore that it was a fine pass when gals took off across the country that-a-way, and he hoped her ma's folks never got wind of it or they'd have him strung up to his own gate-post. But there was a proud gleam in his eyes.

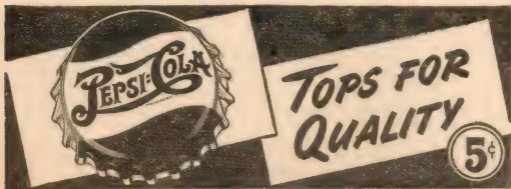

Adele knew that he wasn't really worried about her, that he was as confident that she could take care of herself as though she'd been a son instead of a daughter. Sam Carey wasn't fooled by a twinkling dimple and spun silk curls and a doll-like size. He knew his daughter well.

Two days later Adele reached Thunder Gorge. The daily thunderstorm had just blasted itself out, and the canyon was roaring with flood water, beating its way between rocky walls. It seemed to Adele that she could actually see the spindly supports to the bridge buckle and sway. She shuddered, and urged her horse across.

She rode up over a little ridge, then down through a grove of cottonwoods. The small adobe ranchhouse rested on a little meadow dotted with white Bethlehem stars and blue rutabaga lilies, and Adele approached it with excitement so intense that it was a throbbing pain in her breast.

As she rode into the yard a little old lady came to the open door. Adele smiled at her radiantly. Mark's Aunt Debbie was as small as she herself.

[Turn page]

"Land sakes," Aunt Debbie cried, coming outside, "you must be the Carey girl Mark wrote about. Light and come in, child. Mark isn't home yet. He sent word he was aimin' to stop and corral some help for his round-up." She turned and called, "Bandy, see to Adele's horse."

A bow-legged, wizened old fellow came from the direction of the barn.

"Howdy. Miss Del," he said with a grin. "I knowed yore pa years ago."

Adele liked Bandy immediately. She loved Aunt Debbie. She was at home in Lost Valley as she'd always known she would be. She felt so happy that it was like a song rushing through her. When Mark got home she'd be all ready for him. And he'd be bound to see how naturally she fitted into his life.

Aunt Debbie showed her into a neat, lavender-scented, white-washed bedroom. With an elaborately casual air she brought out a new wedding-ring design patchwork quilt and spread it on one of the two cots.

"Why, what a beautiful quilt!" Adele exclaimed.

The old lady stood looking down on the quilt with its interlocking circles made up of tiny, vivid segments of material put together with thousands of even stitches.

"I always taken to little, spry women," she stated abruptly. "I notice them big, brassy ones like the Shannon gal like to lie abed of mornings, and eat between meals. But shucks, men-folks don't see things like that till it's too late."

She looked squarely up at Adele. They exchanged a long, understanding glance, while Adele's color deepened and her eyes took on a confident sparkle.

Next morning Adele put on the old jeans again, and a fresh cotton shirt, with the sleeves rolled high over her slender arms. She braided the taffy-yellow hair into thick pigtails tied with blue ribbons that fluttered like butterflies at each turn of her head.

She dipped water from the spring for Aunt Debbie, and laughed to see her reflection rippling and dissolving under her eyes. So did troubles disappear when you really tackled them, she thought. And underneath everything else was that burning current of excitement that drew her eyes to the ridge where the trail dipped down to the house, where she'd first glimpse Mark, coming home.

Mid afternoon the usual rain clouds boiled up black and heavy over the mountain peaks. The air became electric and tense, and Adele, returning from a ride around the basin felt a wild exhilaration as she turned her face to the freshening wind.

Old Bandy appeared from a ride up the mountainside, herding a maverick calf in front of him.

"I seen Mark's blue roan headin' toward the bridge," he remarked. "Reckon he ought to show up over the ridge any minute now. Hey!" he yelled after Adele who was swinging her pony around. "The storm's gonna break any minute!"

But Adele urged the pony into a lope. She wanted to meet Mark alone. She reached the cottonwood grove and halted, jumped to the ground. There was a brisk clop-clop of hoofs coming toward her, and Mark's blue roan broke into view.

"Welcome home!" Adele cried.

THE wind rattled the leaves above her, but the sound was drowned in the hard pound of her own heart. Her ribbons fluttered madly and whipped against her cheeks, but her pulse fluttered even more wildly.

"Adele Carey!" Mark exclaimed.

"Who on earth?" another voice cried shrilly.

Adele stepped back out of the flickering leaf shadows and stared at the rider coming up beside Mark. She was looking up at a girl whose black hair streamed in the wind, whose face was burned to a healthy reddish-brown and whose widened dark eyes looked enormous.

Then Mark dismounted and came forward. Adele was stammering out explanations about the paper he'd forgotten to sign, and Mark was saying something about Jody Shannon coming along with him to visit Aunt Debbie.

Jody slipped from her saddle to stand beside Mark. She was very tall. Adele had to look up to her and that made her furious. Or, rather it was the way Jody stood shoulder to shoulder with Mark, staring at Adele as though she were an unwelcome stranger who'd wandered uninvited into the valley.

Lightning darted fiery tongues across the darkening sky and the thunder rolled and crashed. The elements were no more stormy than Adele's emotions. She returned Jody's stare with eyes the dusky, flame-laced darkness of the rain clouds. Then Jody's smile flashed and she slipped her hand familiarly through Mark's arm. Adele winced at that possessive gesture.

"Why, Mark!" Jody cried, "she's frightened of the storm! Poor thing. Didn't you see her shudder?"

Adele found her voice then. "I'm not frightened," she declared furiously, "of the storm or anything else." She groped for the reins that she'd tossed over her saddle horn. "I was just going for a ride."

She sprang into the saddle, turned the pony and blindly headed him up the ridge.

"Del!" Mark called after her.

Jody's high voice cut across his words. "Maybe she wants to be alone, Mark. And besides, the storm is circling the basin. She'll be safe. Let's get these things up to the house."

Adele rode blindly on. She had more than half a notion to keep going, across the bridge and away from Thunder Mountain. Never to see Mark Blair again. But there was that document she'd brought. To save her pride she'd have to take that paper back home with Mark's name on it.

A few cold rain drops spattered against her face, mingling with the hot tears on her cheeks. Then the storm rolled back, gathering itself around the peaks of Thunder Mountain. Adele mopped her damp face with her bandana and felt that she'd done with tears forever. Mark didn't really love her. He had decided that Jody was the one for him.

She simply couldn't go back to the house yet. So she rode on toward the gorge. She rode upstream from the bridge, along the bank where huge granite boulders hung balanced on the rims. So Jody Shannon thought—or pretended to think—that Adele Carey was easily frightened. Was a shuddering, scary weakling. Adele muttered things into the damp, fragrant wind that tugged at her hair till it caught one of her blue bows and swirled it away like a winged thing set free.

If they should happen to be marooned in Lost Valley, the three of them, she'd make that big hulk of a girl change her tune. A wild, reckless notion struck through her, causing her to catch her breath and stare hard at the overhanging boulders. It would be so easy to wedge the end of a broken limb under the edge of one of those rocks, to send it hurtling down the bank and toward the spindly bridge. No one could ever know.

She slipped from her saddle, walked up to a cluster of the rearing boulders. Then, with a regretful little sigh she turned away. She was no bridge wrecker, even though her own dreams had been blown sky high.

CHAPTER IV

Girl Cowhand

BACK at the ranchhouse Adele walked into a kitchen warm and fragrant of chocolate cake. Mark came into the room as Adele stepped inside. He'd changed to a clean blue shirt and his hair was freshly brushed, lying damply smooth on his well-shaped head. His glance flashed to Adele, her face flushed from her swift ride, and her hair blown into a soft fluffiness.

For a heart-stopping second she caught a glimpse of the smouldering lights in his eyes that always made her senses reel.

"Del," he said, "Aunt Debbie tells me you rode out here just to bring me some fool paper to sign."

"I—I was planning on visiting your ranch, anyhow, you know," Adele reminded him.

He came close to her and she bit her lip to steady herself, to keep the love she felt from speaking so plainly from her face. After all, she must hang onto some shreds of pride and dignity.

"So that was it," Mark murmured, and the lights went out of his eyes. His voice hardened. "You just had to have your way, didn't you?"

"Dinner's ready, Mark," came Jody's smug voice from the direction of the stove. "Everything like you always like it."

She carried a steaming gravy-boat to the table, and as Mark turned toward her Adele wished savagely that Jody would stumble, would spatter hot gravy down the front of her red-and-white checked apron with its starched ruffles and flaunting, flaring bow.

Jody smiled sweetly at Adele.

"I always help dear old Aunt Debbie whenever I can," she explained. "So I brought over the cake and planned to stay several days while Mark was so busy with his round-up. That always makes extra work on a ranch, you know."

Is she telling me? Adele thought, and a scornful smile twisted her mouth as she thought of the round-ups she'd ridden ever since she was large enough to balance in a saddle, till her dad had sent her off to school to learn to be a lady.

"Yes," she agreed coolly. "That's why I'd better be getting home, too. If you'll sign that paper, Mark, I'll be lighting out first thing in the morning." She managed to keep the smile on her lips. "It was nice to see Lost Valley at last."

"I reckon, Miss Del," came Bandy's dry voice from the door, "that you'll be seeing more of it for the next week. The bridge done give way at last."

There was a confusion of surprised exclamations. Then a little silence into which Adele's shocked protest sounded very loud.

"Why, it—it couldn't be!" she said.

Mark turned to look at her. She was thinking of how near she'd come to loosening that boulder. She was wondering if thoughts actually had the power that some claimed when his sharpening gaze caught hers.

Adele's glance wavered. A hot tide of color stained her face. She knew that she looked as guilty as she felt. Mark brushed past her.

"Take my bay, Boss!" Bandy yelled after him. "I'll saddle the roan and be right after you."

Adele went out of the kitchen and into the first bright glow of the sunset. She walked to a log bench by the little spring and sank down on it, tilted her head against a granite boulder.

So, here she was. Here to stay for perhaps a week. What more could she ask? Deliberately she pushed away all thought of Jody Shannon. With half-closed eyes she gazed at the sky, the drama of flame-bordered storm clouds changing shape and color even as she watched. A fading rainbow hung like a frayed, pale ribbon across a distant gap. It made Adele feel sad and a bit frightened.

"Just where," came Mark's dangerously quiet voice beside her after a timeless interval, "did you ride this afternoon when you rushed away?"

Adele straightened, her eyes flew wide open and she looked up into Mark's set face.

"Where?" she echoed. Then with gathering indignation at his tone, "That's none of your business."

"I'll tell you then," he replied angrily. "You rode down by the gorge. You dismounted and walked up to the boulders upstream from the bridge."

Adele sprang to her feet. "Do you think I rolled boulders down till they crashed into your old bridge?" she demanded hotly.

But as she remembered how nearly she had done just that her face paled and her voice trembled.

MARK stared at her bleakly. "I found one of your ribbons down the bank," he informed her.

Adele could only stare at him, her eyes feeling glazed in their sockets, her face frozen into blankness.

"You said," he reminded her sternly, "that you always had your way. I reckon just because I told you not to come here you were bent to do just that. And to stay till you got ready to leave. Maybe," his scornful tone went through her like the lightning lashing the clouds that afternoon, "you even had some wild idea of getting Davis Adams up here and your dad high-pressuring him into getting that bridge built."

Adele felt her knees beginning to buckle. She moistened her dry lips with her tongue. She struggled for something to say, something devastating, but tears were gathering back of her eyelids, were making a hot, aching lump in her throat.

"The worst of it is, Boss," came Bandy's anxious voice, "that now the Gomez boys can't get here in time to help round up them yearlings."

Mark turned from Adele. "We'll do it ourselves," he snapped. "I have to get those beefs out in time to catch that drive south."

Bandy let out a shrill whistle. "It cain't be done. Not just you and me, Boss. Not even if we work without stopping, we cain't chose them critters out, corral and brand them in time. We need at least one more hand."

"Well," came Aunt Debbie's annoyed voice, "I want to hear how the bridge went out and what we're aimin' to do about it."

"Looks like it just washed out," Mark said grimly. "Like we been expectin' it to for the last couple of rainy seasons." He never glanced at Adele standing still and small against the granite boulder. "Soon as the word gets out that engineer staying at the Diamond C will get a crew up and a temporary span across."

"But dang it," Bandy broke in, "what I want to know is how we're agoin' to get them yearlings ready for market."

Aunt Debbie placed her hands on her hip. "Well, well," she drawled, "now I reckon is Jody's chance to show she's a good ranch hand."

"Jody?" Mark asked, but his voice quickened with hope.

Bandy disgustedly turned his head and spat tobacco juice.

"Sure enough," Aunt Debbie continued calmly, "I been hearing for years how she could rope and ride and brand, ain't I?" She glanced over her shoulder. "Yonder she comes now, trailing around like a queen in that there kimono she got from the mail-order house."

"What's everyone staying out here for?" Jody called, coming down the trail in a rose-splashed, black sateen wrapper. "I thought I'd get into something comfortable for the evening," she explained self consciously, tightening the sash around her waist and picking her way along in high-heeled slippers, swishing the long skirts around her ankles.

"Jody," said Mark heartily, "am I glad you're here!" He strode toward her. "You can help Bandy and me get those yearlings rounded up. The three of us can have them all branded and ready by the time Adams comes charging up here to throw a bridge across the gorge."

His hands closed on Jody's arms and he gave her an affectionate little shake. Adele closed her eyes and leaned limply back against the boulder. Two hot tears squeezed from under her lashes and rolled unheeded down her cheeks.

Adele had thought she couldn't live through the night, occupying the same room as Jody. She'd surely never be able to go to sleep beneath the gay wedding-ring quilt with the scorn in Mark's voice ringing in her ears, with that bleak accusation in his eyes stabbing through her. And worst of all was the relief and confidence in his manner when he turned to Jody.

The other girl settled down on her cot and turned her back. Adele lay looking out the open window, feeling the mountain-sweet breeze like a cool caress on her hot face. She stared up at the star-patterned, black sky till the stars blurred and shimmered in a dizzy dance, and, amazingly enough, she fell soundly asleep.

She woke at the sound of voices in the kitchen. The gray sky was just streaking rose over the eastern rim of the mountains. Jody still slept deeply. Adele splashed her face with the icy cold water from the china pitcher, quickly combed and braided her hair and dressed.

She tiptoed out of the bedroom and to the kitchen.

"Send Jody down to the corral soon as she's ready," Mark was saying to Aunt Debbie while he poured coffee for Bandy. "She—" He glanced up, saw Adele in the doorway and stopped short.

"Look out, ye dang fool!" yelled Bandy, grabbing the tilting coffee pot.

Adele's color deepened and the dimple appeared at the corner of her mouth.

"Up bright and early, ain't ye?" Debbie said approvingly. "Little women is always the ones to get around." She sent a disparaging glance toward the room where Jody slept.

JODY hadn't appeared when they finished breakfast, and it was Adele, slim and straight as a boy in her ranch clothes, who accompanied Mark and Bandy to the corral, who saddled the roan pony for herself and headed for the mountain slopes with the two men.

"I can hold the cattle in a bunch while you rustle them out of the brush," she declared.

Mark looked at her doubtfully. "That's a pretty tough job. Some of these beefs have been up in the hills all summer."

"Try me," Adele challenged him.

It was tough, but not too tough. She rode close circle on the gathering herd, keeping an alert eye on a couple of wild-eyed steers. Her pony was well-trained and she hadn't lost a yearling by mid-morning when they paused to take stock.

Mark said with satisfaction that they'd better take the bunch they had down to the corral and start branding. As they rode down the mountain side Jody appeared, riding leisurely toward them.

"Fine hand you turned out to be," Mark chided her half-seriously.

Jody urged her pony close to his. "It's the mountain air," she explained, "it always makes me sleepy." Mark grinned down at her, and she smiled radiantly up into his face.

When it came to the branding Jody made a great show of her skill with a rope. For about an hour she performed like a rodeo champ and Adele had to sit back and acknowledge that she could toss a mean loop. Then an ugly tempered long-horn made a break for the brush. Jody swung wide, missed him and lost her balance, sailing out of her saddle to land on the soft sand with a thud.

"Haw! Haw!" cackled Bandy, "that was as pretty a spill as I ever see."

Mark cut after the runaway steer and edged it back into the corral. Then he turned with a teasing remark for Jody, but the dark girl still sat on the sand.

Riding up, Adele caught a glance of pure malice divided between herself and Bandy. Then Jody turned toward Mark and spoke with a catch in her voice,

"I—think I've hurt my back," she said.

"Back?" echoed Bandy. "That ain't where you landed, sis."

Adele swung down from her saddle.

"Jody," she offered, "I took home nursing at school. Let me see if—"

Jody brushed her away. "Don't bother me." She glared at Adele and turned to Mark. "If you'll just lift me into the saddle I'm sure I can make it to the house."

"There goes your hand, Mark," Bandy said dryly as Jody rode away. He winked at Adele. "I didn't figure her to last long."

CHAPTER V

Love Lingers

MARK tugged his hat down on his head, set his jaw at an angle and went at the branding with a grim determination that discouraged further conversation. Adele stuck it out the whole long, dusty, back-breaking day. More than once she had cause to be thankful for the times she'd gone out on the round-up at the Diamond C and worked like any hired hand.

They dragged in for supper, Adele sure that each step was her last. In the bedroom she looked longily at her smoothly made cot. But she turned away and splashed water on her face, dampened a comb and fluffed out the tight ringlets at her forehead.

Jody languidly rose from the sofa in the parlor. She trailed her way to the table, hugging her rose-flowered kimono around her, smiling at Mark.

Dinner revived Adele a bit. She set down her coffee cup and looked up to meet Deb-bie's approving glance full on her, and gave a weary sigh of contentment. Mark was staring at her with a strange expression on his face. When she caught his glance he looked away swiftly. He stood up and pushed back his chair.

"It's bright moonlight tonight," he declared, and walked toward the door. "I'm going to finish that bunch we corralled today."

Adele swallowed hard. Then she stood up, too, followed him. At the door Mark turned so suddenly that she almost ran into him.

"I'm g-going, too," she said breathlessly.

He was so close to her that she had to tip her head back to meet his glance. Then she saw that his mouth was set in a straight, hard line. He reached down and scooped her into his arms, carried her across the room and into the bedroom where he dumped her down on her cot.

"Stay there," he ordered brusquely.

Adele lay back with her head on her arms. Jody's voice rose plaintively from the kitchen.

"Oh, Mark, don't go out again," she pleaded. "I was going to make the kind of fudge you like best."

Adele rolled over and listened intently. She smiled when the kitchen door closed and she could hear Mark's footsteps going away.

The next two days Jody lay around in her flowered kimono and Adele worked along with Bandy and Mark. On the third day Mark tossed down the branding iron he held, released the bawling calf to join its fellows and announced on a long, weary sigh that they'd done the job.

He turned to stare at Adele, small and dusty and disheveled, sitting her pony like any sturdy little ranch kid who'd been at the job since she could stick in a saddle.

"You get to the house and get some rest," he said almost harshly. "Your old man and that engineer are going to be showing up any time now and I don't want them to take one look at what Lost Valley's done to you and reach for their six-shooters."

Adele's grimy little face went white beneath layers of dust. The sharpness of Mark's tone cut her to the heart. Without a word she wheeled her pony and headed for the house. And she had dared to hope she'd changed his mule-stubborn mind for him. That she'd made him see that she was of the stuff of pioneer maids.

Next morning she stayed in her room till she heard Mark and Bandy leave. Then she got up and dressed listlessly, moving with a numbness that she felt would be with her forever.

It was early afternoon when Sam Carey, Davis Adams and the construction crew arrived. By next morning they had a temporary span over the gorge, and one of the cowboys, Slim Morris, from the nearest spread on the other side dared the first trip across.

"I want to speak to you, Mark, private," Slim said excitedly. "It's about what I seen just before the bridge went down."

Mark's face closed up. He avoided looking at Adele.

"What difference does it make now, Slim? It would have gone out anyhow, sooner or later, and as it happened I got my herd rounded up without the Gomez boys."

They walked a little way apart from the others as they talked.

Sam gave his daughter a bear hug.

"How're you doing, honey?" he asked. "I held Adams off long as I could, but he's been raring to get that bridge started ever since you left."

Adele drew him aside.

"Dad, was it necessary for Mark to sign that paper I brought?" she asked bluntly.

Sam chuckled. "I figured it was necessary for you to have some excuse to follow him out here, baby."

Suddenly Jody, who'd been making up to Davis Adams, brushed by Adele.

"Just a minute, Slim," she called, "I want to hear what you're telling Mark about that bridge."

"Well, maybe you do at that," Slim replied coolly.

Adele followed Jody. "I may have to get in on this," she explained to her dad.

NOW, she was thinking, was the time once and for all to make it clear to Mark Blair that she certainly had not done anything to hasten the destruction of the Thunder Gorge Bridge.

"So I see this little button streaking it out across the range," Slim was saying in a low, earnest voice, "and I wonder how come? I went on, and I barely reached the bank when the bridge caved in. Just went kersplash. First I thought some of them big boulders rolled down at last, and I looked up that way. You couldn't tell, they're thicker'n fleas on a dog's ear along both banks. Then I looked down in the stream bed, but it wasn't no boulder that smashed that timber." He paused and stared around for full effect.

"Well?" Mark demanded, an impatient edge to his voice. "If you're sure it wasn't a boulder that rolled against it, what was it?"

"That timber on the far end, the end toward the other side there," he jerked his head toward the opposite bank, "had been sawed mighty nigh through."

"Sawed?" Mark demanded. "You sure?"

"Dead sure," Slim replied. "And furthermore, I turned around and run down that little button and sure enough he was packing a saw."

There was a moment's silence. Mark scowled and Slim waited, rolling a wad of tobacco around in his jaw.

"Oh, for heaven's sake," Jody broke in, "go on and tell. It was my brother, Billy, who sawed that timber. I promised to buy him a new saddle for the rodeo if he'd do it." Her words were defiant, but her voice was shaking and quivery as she turned to Mark, "And what are you going to do about it?"

"Why did you do that, Jody?" Mark asked blankly.

Jody gulped. "I had to do something. Ever since we came here all you'd talk about was Adele Carey. I th-thought if you and I were shut off here in the valley for a week or so, if you saw what a g-good cook I was and everything you'd maybe forget Adele Carey long enough to see I was alive."

"Why, Jody," Mark began awkwardly.

"Don't worry!" she flared at him. "I wouldn't have you now if I were marooned with you in Paradise forever! A whole four days and you don't do a thing but work cattle! Coming in without shaving." She shuddered. "Riding. Roping. Branding. Why, I want some fun out of life! I wouldn't stay on a two-bit, shoe-string spread like this another week for any man alive!"

She whirled on Slim. "And if you say a word about Billy doing this I'll swear it's all a lie, and I'll tell about that time you got drunk and broke the windows in old lady Shuster's cabin—"

"Now, now, Jody," Slim cut in anxiously, "no one's aimin' to get Billy in trouble. I just thought Mark ought to know it wasn't no accident."

"Far as I'm concerned it was an accident, Jody, all of it," Mark assured her hastily.

He was looking past her to Adele. She saw the smouldering lights in his eyes and for a moment her pulses fluttered and her very bones seemed to melt. Then she stiffened. She could never forget him riding toward her with Jody at his side, bringing the other girl into Lost Valley.

She turned and ran toward the bridge. "I'm coming, Dad," she called unsteadily.

"Hold on, Miss Del!" She'd reached the bridge when Bandy came trotting down from the ridge. "Aunt Debbie's took a sudden attack. Heart, or somethin'. Anyhow she sent me hightailing it after you, pronto. You'd better come, you having took that home nursing."

"I don't savvy," Mark kept saying, striding along beside her. "Aunt Debbie never had a sick day in her life. Why, she's tough as rawhide even though she's no bigger than a minute."

Inside the cabin Debbie lay limply on the parlour sofa. She lifted her eyelids weakly and stared dazedly at them. She clutched feebly for Adele's hand with her gnarled old fingers.

"Don't leave me, Del," she gasped hoarsely.

"I won't," Adele promised.

She took the old lady's pulse, felt of the veined forehead and frowned.

"I feel better already," Debbie whispered.

"Can I tell your dad you'll be stayin'?"

Mark asked anxiously. "They're waiting at the bridge."

Adele nodded. "I'll be along when Aunt Debbie is better."

"Hadh'n't I better get the doctor from town?" Mark asked from the doorway.

Debbie roused herself. "If that sawbones sets foot in here I'll blast him with my six-gun," she said firmly. "Del's all I need."

WHEN Mark came back Adele met him at the door.

"She's asleep now," she whispered, and slipped outside.

"She doesn't sound like she's breathing very good," Mark said, listening to the old lady's light snores. "Doesn't sound just natural."

Adele smiled reassuringly and walked a little way from the house.

"She'll be all right," she insisted.

Mark followed her. They stood watching the heat lightning flaring over the looming peaks.

"Reckon," Mark said finally, staring straight ahead, "that I owe you an apology. 'Bout that bridge."

"Well," Adele confessed, "I did ride that way, and the wind did blow one of my ribbons off."

"You must have thought," she added when he said nothing more, "that I'd go to any lengths to stay here in Lost Valley." She couldn't, thinking about Jody, keep the hurt and bitterness out of her voice.

Mark reddened. He made two false starts and then spoke in a low, husky voice.

"Reckon I was the one did that," he said. "Went to any lengths to keep you here, I mean."

Adele's breath caught. Her eyes flew wide. "What do you mean?" It seemed to her the very wind through the trees stopped to listen.

"Well," Mark growled out, "any fool would know anyone as light and little as you could have got through Pinnacle Pass. The Parker kid made it twice last month just for devilment. I could have sent you out the day after the bridge went down."

He stared fiercely at her as though daring her to laugh. "But I—I—it was so nice seeing you around here, and getting along so well with Aunt Debbie, and—hang it all, Bandy and I couldn't have got those beefs ready for market without you."

"You—you're actually saying you needed me here," Adele murmured. All the rainbows in the world were shining in her eyes, were trembling through the soft-spoken words.

"And now," Mark said miserably, "you'd be gone if it weren't for Aunt Debbie needin' you. I've been such a hard-headed, scary fool, Del."

"Mark," Adele said in a shaky voice, "there was nothing the matter with Aunt Debbie. She was just—just giving me a chance to stay on. She told me as soon as you left. I could easily have caught up with you and gone with Dad."

Her confession was lost in the wild whoop which Mark gave as he caught her to him.

"Honey-child," he said with his lips against her cheek, "it looks like you're going to be marooned in Lost Valley for life."

Hattie booted Adam in the seat of his pants

Adam from New Eden

By JOE ARCHIBALD

Hattie Pringle promotes a padlockless paradise but finds that crooks are no respecters of Milldew's civic pride!

FIVE minutes after the monthly meeting of the Milldew, Montana, Civic Improvement Society had been called to order, it was as plain as the lack of a nose on a mudworm's face that Hattie Pringle, the president, had pounced upon a brilliant idea. Even Judge Tolliver admitted it. He got to his feet with a yelp.

"Hooray fer Hattie! It's a pergressive bonanza, feller citizens! It's a—"

"It is that too," Hattie beamed, and banged her gavel against the table. "Sit down, you ol' fossilhead. Don't you know anythin' about Parlermentrecy percedure. As I was cayin', I tumbled t' the idea las' night. Milldew has the lowes' crime rate fer any community in Montana. Nobody can say it ain't as look at the records! I had this painted."

Hattie signalled toward the wings of the little stage of the Odd Fellow's Hall and two citizens came out carrying a great sign that said:

COME TO MILLDEW FOR SAFE KEEP-ING! WHERE HONEST HEARTS BEAT
AS ONE! LOWEST CRIME RATE IN MON-TANA. YOU ARE ENTERING MILLDEW,
THE PADLOCKLESS PARADISE. BRING YOUR FAMILIES! BRING YOUR BUSI-NESSES. STOP AT THE MILLDEW
HOUSE—LOOK FOR THE SIGN, HATTIE
PRINGLE, REAL ESTATE. LISTEN TO THE HAPPY LAUGHTER OF OUR CHIL-DREN!

"Thought a li'l advertisin' on the side wouldn't hurt," Hattie said quickly. "Now we'll name committees fer the campaign an' start rollin', huh? No competition here, not even from a town called New Eden. They had two holdups there las' week, a wife-beatin', a gamblin' den raid an' a riot at the Moose picnic. Judge Tolliver is general chairman. Clem Hooks is publicity—"

A half hour later, the meeting broke up amid wild applause for Hattie Pringle. She grinned broadly as she picked up her shoes and put them on. She was sure she heard a few chirps out of the bedraggled bird that nestled in a bunch of grapes on her old sky-piece.

"There is great da-a-a-a-a-ys comin'," she sang. "Everythin' in ro-o-o-o-sy now!"

She flicked a spot of imaginary dust from a taffeta sleeve and left the hall. Milling citizens offered her congratulations as she lumbered across the street toward her office building.

"Oh, it wa'n't nothin'," Hattie snickered. She was glad however, to get to her old baling-wire bound armchair in her office.

"Kin I draw 'em outa the hat, Pete?" she asked a picture that hung from the wall. "Less crime'n any other community in the state. Glad you ain't sheriff—er—I am only kiddin', you ol' stewpot. Times've changed an' sheriffs mos'ly git hurt now lookin' t' see if a gun is loaded or comin' home after mid-night from a poker game they was not supposed to go to. Good thing you fergot t'duck, Pete. You wouldn't like the modern worl'."

Hattie worked out some more campaign slogans and then closed up and left her office. As she was about to load herself into her Model T, Judge Tolliver appeared.

"Sure throwed the hooks in t' Appleby, Hattie. Met him over in the hardware store. Had t' come t' Milldew for some nails as after that store was stuck up in New Eden, the perprieter got scairt an' closed up fer a week. Never saw Adam shorter of words. He looked like he had found out he'd swallowed a caterpillar in a drugstore san'wich when I tol' him what we was goin' t' do."

"I oughter pass an ordnance to close your big mouth, you ol' foghorn," Hattie said. "Why did you have t' git vaccinated with a phonograft needle? Well, I don't figger that ol' finngier can stop us nohow. Judge, I can see a skyscraper over where that Chineese laundry is."

Tolliver stared at the two-story building and the little Celestial who was carrying a basket of wash out. He turned to Hattie and sniffed.

"You made that batch of elderberry danged strong, Hattie. Why so stingy with it, huh?"

"Bushwash!" Hattie pushed out, and climbed aboard the Model T. "No more imagination in you than in a burrer's rump." She drove away.

THE next morning broke as rosy as the one preceding it and Hattie arrived at her office, rolling up her sleeves, and fairly gurgling with vim and vigor. She plunged into her chair and snatched up a pencil. Ten minutes later she was elbow deep in superlatives anent the honesty of the town of Milldew.

She looked up suddenly, wondered why the sun was not pouring through the window. She heard steps outside and they sounded forlorn and dispirited. They finally came up the stairs, along the corridor, and into the office. They belonged to Judge Tolliver; Milo Camby; Milldew's Chief of Police; and an apologetic, stringy citizen named Purdy Shim, collector of taxes.

"I have seen three sunnier faces in the bottoms of tar buckets," Hattie yelped. "No wonder the sun ducked behind a cloud. Unhobble your tongue, Judge. Oh, gobs, I got a feelin'—"

"We are sunk, Hattie."

"Look, I hate guessin' games, you baga-bones," Hattie gulped.

"Tell her, Milo," the Judge said.

"Well," Camby said. "Brace yourself, ma'am. You know Jubal Fogg?"

"Not more'n I have to," Hattie snapped. "Got a rundown spread back of Sugarloaf. Been told he ain't paid his taxes sence—"

Purdy Shim swallowed hard and made a sound like a green pear dropping into a tin pail.

"What is eatin' you, Purdy?" Hattie asked.

"He knows Jube did pay taxes," Judge Tolliver said in a rusty voice. "Jube come in when he heard the rumor an' he brought his son with him, Hattie. Elbie learned book-keepin' in school. Elbie found out Purdy here is a embezzler. Jube went to Camby here an' says he wants Purdy put in jail. Milo figgered you might see Jube an' kinda squish the charges or hol' them off until—"

"Wha-a-a-a-a?" Hattie gurgled. "You plead guilty, Purdy? There is a mistake somewheres. Nobody can do this t' me—"

"I been bad, Hattie," Purdy Shim admitted. "Got into poker games at the Milldew House an'—"

"Poker games?" Hattie groaned and sagged in her chair. "A embezzler. Purdy, you polecat, you've held Milldew back fifty years. Throw him in jail, Camby. Do your duty—er—wait! Nope, I'll try an' reason with Jube Fogg which is as much sense as tryin' to git a cow t' spell out words. If he's got civil pride—"

"An' if Purdy skips town?" Milo Camby asked. "You'll take the responsib—?"

"Yep, an' carbolic acid too," Hattie groaned. "Say, I can make up the shortage an' everythin' will be awright, huh? What did we git excited for, huh?"

"Maybe 'cause Jube took the tax books," Judge Tolliver said. "An' threatens t' send fer the examiner if we don't prosecute Purdy inside thirty days."

"We are stalemates," Hattie sighed, and the bird on her hat shed three more feathers and dropped its head into the clump of cherries, out of sight. "I will go an' see Fogg. Don't you dast leave Milldew, Purdy Shim, or I will foller you t' the ends of the earth until I hunt you down, an' I'll think up slow torture 'fore I kill you. Pete told me once how a Mex— Git out of here, an' if anybody blabs, there will be a murder added t' Milldew's list of crimes. Milldew either stays lily-white or she goes whole hog in the depths of degradation. I am a desperate woman, gents!"

"I wisht I was dead," Purdy moaned, clutching his head with shaking hands.

"You never was closter to bein', dearie," Hattie said as she hurried out.

AN HOUR later she rolled her Model T up to a gate over the top rail of which Jube Fogg was leaning, a big corncob pipe in his teeth. Jube had a little egg-shaped head, a wiry mustache and an ornery disposition. There was a knowing gleam in his beady eyes.

"Howdy, Hattie. What brings you t' the Pothook, jus' as if I didn' know?"

"Jube," Hattie said. "Le's stop kiddin' around, huh? You know what is at stake in Milldew. Them tax books, now. Purdy Shim agrees t' make restitution an'—"

"They're yourn, Hattie."

"Huh? Say that again, Jube, as me left ear has been botherin' me lately."

"On one condition," Jube said.

"I shoul'da known," Hattie gulped. "How much do you want, you ol' bandit? Up t' where I can just escape bankruptcy?"

"Lettin' you off easy, Hattie. You know my daughter, Jennie? Kinda gittin' along, she is. Twenty-eight tomorrer. A gal should be married before she's thirty, don't you think, huh?"

"You mean—?" Hattie asked thickly. "Yep, you do. I git her married. Oh, gobs, not that, Jube. I kin offer you a piece of land—"

"Got enough of it, Hattie. You heard my terms. Git Jennie a husban' an' you git the tax books," Jube said, and glanced up at the lowering sky. "Looks like rain, huh? Better start back 'fore you git wet. An' old bird like you gits pains in the joints an'—come an' stop by ag'in, Hattie. You make up your mind, let me know, yep."

"It—it—it's a deal," Hattie said.

She saw Jennie Fogg tripping a not-so-light and certainly not a fantastic toe across the yard between the henhouse and the backdoor. Jennie had molasses-colored hair which was as stringy as a dried-out mop, and sloping shoulders and skinny legs. She wore flat-heeled shoes that were curled up at the toes and her dress had no more shape to it than if it had been draped over a snubbing post.

"You ast the impossible, Jube, you ol' gopher. Well, Milldew's fair name is worth the try. One thing, though. Tell her t' be at my office in jus' three hours!"

I ATTIE PRINGLE thought of prospect No. 1 for Jennie Fogg as she drove slowly back to Milldew. Even the Model T's engine was sluggish and its battered fenders drooped like beet-tops during a thirty day drought.

"Yep," she said. "I'll start in with Eph Dilldock, that's what." She rummaged around in a compartment on the skitter-buggy's dash and got a clothespin and put it on her nose.

Eph Dilldock had a little place not far from Goose Creek. He raised truck and specialized in pigs. Eph needed a wife badly and had, on occasion, admitted it in public.

Hattie found Eph engaged in mending his swill wagon. She passed the time of day, brushed over the economic condition of the county and then came to the point.

"You oughter gen marrib, Emph—" Hattie removed the clothespin. "Know just the gal for you, too. Keeps talkin' t' me about you, how you look s' lonesome an' never have no buttons sewed on. Jennie Fogg."

"Her?" Eph sniffed. "Ain't too purty, Hattie."

"Oh, but you ain't seen her sincet she made herself over. Been readin' a woman's magazine, Eph, Jennie has. Why don't you come over fer supper tomorrer night?"

"Your house, Hattie? Huh, that's sassiety, ain't it? Well, I figger a feller oughter improve hisself. Thanks, Ma'am. Better run into town an' git me a lot of that cologne water t'day."

Hattie nodded, replaced the clothespin until she was to leeward of the Dilldock layout.

"Huh, a pushover. Maybe Milldew'll git saved yet. Soon as I kin git Jennie slicked up—oh-h-h, Jennie-ve-e-e-eve—sweet Jenny—!"

When Hattie reached town, she immediately made an appointment with Madame LeFondu, nee Aggie Fondu, Milldew's beauty specialist.

"Have the patient in pretty soon, dearie. Don't git discouraged when you see her. Fifty dollars I'm offerin' t' renervate her an' I'm expectin' a first-class job."

"You are playin' Cupid ag'in, Hattie. You sure got a magic touch. Who you marryin' the gal off to?"

"Hah, wouldn't you like t' know, M'dom? Bon sewer fer now, Maddermoselle," Hattie grinned and waddled out.

She nearly fell over a citizen who had dropped a pipe and was bent over picking it up.

"What you snoopin' aroun' Milldew fer, Appleby, you ol' flibbertigibbet? Any more crime in New Eden, that den of dishones' iniquity?"

"Pretty smug nowadays, ain't you, you ol' fat sage hen?"

Hattie swung her warbag.

"Ugh!" Adam grunted, and his pipe flew out of his mouth and plopped into a rain-barrel.

"That'll teach you t' respect the weaker sects," Hattie snapped, and crossed the street.

Adam Appleby staggered to the porch of the Milldew House and immediately began to think of the matter of revenge. As president of the New Eden Forum for Fostering Progress, he knew results were expected.

"Permotin' another hookup, huh?" he mumbled to himself. "When she mates a pair it ain't because she jus' wants 'em t' be happy, nope. Always somethin' in it fer her or the town. Jennie Fogg, h-m-m. Jube's a church goer an' is a stickler for the Golden Rule. I'll keep an eye on the Pothook."

That afternoon, late, Madame LeFondu still labored over Jennie. Hattie Pringle admitted she was ready to give up herself once. But when night began to fall, she discovered that her fifty dollars were not spent entirely in vain. Jennie Fogg was still no raving beauty, but she would do. "Wait'll certain fellers git a look at you, dearie," Hattie grinned. "Eph Dilldock, fer instance."

"Him?" Jennie sniffed. "The piggy man?"

"Guess you ain't seen Eph dressed up an' soaked in eau de lilacs, huh?" Hattie said. "There's a big future in cured hams. Ever hear of the Swifts family? Millionaires, Jennie, yep."

"My favorite meat is fried ham steak," Jennie nasaled, and ogled herself in the mirror. "Gee, Hattie, I look ravenous."

"Come aroun' t' supper tomorrer night, Jennie. Got a silk dress'll fit you," Hattie said. "My honeymoon dress—only wore it oncet. We kin make it over. It's time you got married, Jennie."

"You think I've fergot that?" Miss Fogg bridled. "They been callin' me an' ol' maid. I'll show 'em, you wait an' see."

"That's the spirit!" Hattie said. "Stick with me, dearie, an' you'll wear a diamond. Almost one, anyways. See you tomorrer night, Jennie."

Judge Tolliver knocked on Hattie's door at nine-thirty that night.

"Been over t' New Eden, Hattie," he said. "Saw Appleby, an' don't like the look on his face."

"Nobody never did, even his ma."

"He's schemin', Hattie."

"You surprise me, Judge. You'd git t' wonderin' if you saw a wolf sharpenin' its teeth. Nobody's got a chancet ag'in us," Hattie said. "Go home, Judge, as I am a widdar an' could git compermissed."

THE romance between Jennie Fogg and Eph Dilldock became the talk of the town. Never had a Romeo, even with a balcony, made such rapid progress with a Juliet as had the pig fancier with Jube Fogg's daughter. In three days he had wooed and won and was dickering with the Milldew jeweler for a wedding ring. Jube Fogg called on Hattie when it looked as if Jennie was as good as in Eph's kitchen tossing hotcakes.

"Got t' hand it to you, Hattie," Jube said. "I'm a man of my word, yep. Just after the knot is tied, you git the tax books an' Purdy Shim kin start anew."

"Oh, it wa'n't nothin', Jube," Hattie sniffed. "It is the same all over. You scratch my back, I'll scratch yourn."

"Huh?" Jube gulped. "You work fast, don't you? A widdar an' me a—you go on now, you ol' jazzabel. Nobody's safe when you—"

"If Milldew's fair name wa'n't at stake, I'd hand you one on the beezel!" Hattie yelled. "Incineratin' I'd set me cap fer you! If I ever set anythin', it'll be a bear trap. You fog outa here, you ol' rooey!"

It happened just after Milldew had had breakfast the next morning. Adam Appleby and the New Eden sheriff came into town and barged into Hattie Pringle's office. Appleby grinned and snarled like a wolf.

"Milldew," he sneered. "Where hones' hearts beat as one. Lowes' crime rate in the State, huh? Well, we got Eph Dilldock in jail, you ol' mudhen. He stole Black Diamon', my prize hog. Yep, I missed him an' went over t' Dilldock's. There it was, right in his pen. Still there now with that black spot on its back. Everybody knows that hawg. Caught Dilldock with a pail of whitewash, jus' comin' out of his house—"

"Wha-a-a-a?" Hattie gulped. "Come on, you pair of coyotes. Git in this skitter-buggy. Somethin's—"

Hattie ran as fast as a woman of her girth would permit into the New Eden lockup a half hour later.

She found Eph Dilldock hunched up on a wooden bench.

"It was there, Hattie," he said. "Must of wandered off from Appleby's pens an' got into mine. Tha's all I kin figger."

Adam Appleby, Dealer in Livestock, Wholesale Butcher, President of New Eden's Forum for Fostering Progress, indulged in a fiendish triumphant grin.

"Don't look at me like that, Hattie. I am jus' an indignant citizen who is the victim of Milldew's lawless element."

"Le's go to Dilldock's. I want t' see that pig! I got a hunch, you swine swindler!" Hattie snapped.

All concerned were soon watching Hattie try to erase a black diamond patch from a big porker's back. Hattie used water, vinegar and spot remover she found in Eph's house. She labored futilely and at last sighed deeply and plumped down in a chair.

"You got me, it looks like. When's the trial?"

"Week from tomorrer," Appleby grinned. "You bring bail, huh?"

"Eph kin stew in his hog juice," Hattie howled.

Two hours later, Jube Fogg came to see Hattie in her place of business in Milldew.

"It is all off, Hattie. No daughter of mine weds a hog thief. She tol' me so, 'fore I said she never would. Well, I better git these tax books t' the examiner or write him a letter—"

"Look, Jube," Hattie said. "There is as good suckers—er—fish in Goose Creek as was ever caught. Gimme one more chancet. Look, I thought of a legible mate fer Jennie. Wendell Bunce. Better lookin' than Eph, too."

"No visible means of support, Hattie," Jube sniffed. "Feller's got t' support Jen the way she was accustomed. Nope."

"He's got a voice, Jube," Hattie yelled, thinking like lightning. "You've heard them cowboy singers on the new Victorolas? I'll git him an addition after trainin' his voice. They got a teacher in Three Falls, Jube. We'll make Wendell a cowboy crooner!"

"You got just twenty days, Hattie," Jube said. "It is a bargain. I got t' marry Jennie off as I promised her ma the las' thing—"

"Here we go ag'in," Hattie sighed loud and gustily, and went out of her office and down the stairs.

SHE drove to the Bunce place three miles from town. Wendell lived in a small white clapboard house, enjoying idleness furnished him by a small legacy left to him by an uncle in Butte. Wendell was strumming a banjo and crooning Buffalo Gal, Won't You Come Out T'Night? Wendell could generally be found under the big elm tree in the yard or on the banks of Goose Creek, fishing.

"Howdy, Wendell," Hattie greeted. "You got the sweeties' voice."

"You think so, huh?" Wendell's face beamed.

"Yep. An' even Jennie Fogg mentioned it only awhile ago, Wendell," Hattie said innocently enough.

"Say, she sure got herself up mighty cute, Mrs. Pringle. Didn't know her at first. She said that?"

"Ain't it awful lonesome here, Wendell? What you got ahead after your legacy peters out?" Hattie asked, easing her big chassis into an old canvas hammock that instantly broke. "Oops," Hattie gulped. "There goes me upper plate, Wendell. Yep, Jennie is cute. Feller'll be lucky t' git her. When times git bad, she kin do the whites' washin's I ever saw."

"Goin' t' marry the pig man, ain't she?" Wendell asked, and strummed his banjo.

"It's all over. Didn't you hear? Eph got caught stealin' a hawg from Adam Appleby," Hattie said. "I bet if you just cut loose with that voice, Wendell, you could git it on Victorrola records an' git rich. There's a singin' school in Three Falls. I'd be willin' to pay your intuition as I hate t' see a voice go neglected. Look what would of happened if somebody didn't stake Crusoe. His man, Friday, fer instants."

"Hattie, you are sure the best ol' fossil," Wendell complimented. "Er, not too old as you ain't got too many gray hairs. Think Jennie would git mad if I called on her? Like you said, my legeracy can't last, an' while I was gittin' famous, Jennie could take in wash—only fer a littel while of courst—"

"We will drive to Three Falls tomorrer, Wendell," Hattie said. "Is it a deal, huh? An' I kinda am on the right side of Jennie. If I kind of put in a good word—"

"You are the salt of the earth, Hattie."

"Yep, an' if things don't turn out fer me the way they got to, Wendell, I'll be sprinkled all over the earth," Hattie gulped. "You keep mum about this, sabe?"

She got up and groped her way to her Model T.

"Sometimes, you ol' coot, an' I'm talkin' to you, Hattie Pringle, I don't see where you git the nerve, you ol' meddle-snoot. But maybe Wendell has a voice kin be trained. It is not just meself I'm thinkin' of. I wisht I could be more convincin', though."

That afternoon, a New Eden paper hit Milldew. A big headline mocked the town's citizens. PIG THIEF STAMPEDES PRINGLE PUBLICITY STUNT. Milldew's Boast of Low Crime Rate Hits Snag. New Eden Adds Lawmen In Anticipation Of Wave Of Crime!

Hattie Pringle stamped a newspaper into the mud and walked into the drugstore, realizing that Milldew was forever lost if news of Purdy Shim's embezzlement of tax funds ever leaked out.

"Look, Sam," she said to the druggist. "I'm figurin' on sproutin' a flock of gray hairs. Got anythin' t'—you know—"

"Why, just the thing, Hattie. Recently interduced t' the market. Nodley's Neverfade Hair Dye. Nothin'll take it off. Eighty-five cents the large size—figurin' on marryin' ag'in?"

"Shut your silly face!" Hattie sniffed, then got a little weak at the knees.

She thought of the pig called Black Diamond and was pretty certain Adam Appleby had indulged in a rare and slimy bit of toboggan greasing. She also knew that if Neverfade was all it was advertised to be, there was no use in trying to prove a thing on Adam.

"I bet he did," Hattie ground out. "No way of provin' it. If he had a pig the same size—Oh, gobs, I will git that renergade some day if I have t' hang fer it. Looks like it is up t' Wendell!"

Hattie drove Wendell to Three Falls the next day and ushered him into the studio of Professo Hugo Tosti, teacher of voice.

"I'm puttin' my prodigal in your charge," Hattie said. "In two weeks I'll know if I been a sucker or not. A hun'ed dollars ain't alfalfa, Tosti, t' kiss goodbye. You study hard now, Wendell, an' you'll be more famous, maybe, than Bodge Roger, the famous cowboy crooner."

"The course takes three months, Madam," Tosti assured Hattie loftily. "Two weeks, pouf!"

"You throw it all into two weeks," Hattie said. "Times have changed an' we got a worl' that moves fast these days. You got paid, didn't you, dearie? Goodbye ag'in, Tosti."

"I'll make good, Hattie," Wendell promised. "Las' night I promised Jennie. Yep, she ast me t' call on her, whicht I did. She sure has changed, Hattie."

BNCE more Milldew marvelled at Jennie Fogg's sudden popularity. People forgot Eph Dilldock and watched the new romance unfold. The Milldew Clarion prophesied, at Hattie's urging, great things for Wendell Bunce. His voice would be preserved on waxen discs for prosperity, an editorial said.

Meanwhile the campaign to set up Milldew as the most virtuous community in the State went on, albeit a trifle abstractedly. It was common knowledge that one citizen was ready to be tried as a pig thief. The chairman, Judge Tolliver, held the secret of Purdy Shim's shame in his leathery heart, and so the Judge did not really have it in his work.

"After all," Hattie exhorted her indolent committee one night at a hastily assembled meeting, "nothin' is perfect, huh? We didn't say we had no badmen, just less than any other town. We kin still win, feller citizens!"

"But pig stealin', Hattie," Mrs. Tolliver squeaked. "If it was only a train robbery or a murder, we could cover that up in time. But stealin' a pig—"

"Yep," Tolliver said, half asleep. "An' that tax money. Why, we won't never—" Hattie banged the gavel down and lifted Judge Tolliver right out of his chair.

"You forgot yourself, you ol' goat! You are out of order, Judge!" Hattie took time out to mop the beads of fright water off her brow. "We ain't here t' discuss taxes. Meetin' adjourned. Oh, gobs!"

The deadline was near when Wendell Bunce arrived at Hattie's office one morning and announced that he was ready for his debut.

"I'll sing fer the town, Hattie," he said. "Then you kin judge whether you'll git me an audition with a record maker, huh? We'll hold the recital Saturday afternoon, huh? Out in the open as the professor says he wants t' check my range."

"Don't like the sound of that, Wendell. I'll make sure he ain't got a gun. We'll make the preparations an' put out han' bills. Poor Eph, he got thirty days in the New Eden jail this mornin',"

"Serves him right," Wendell sniffed. "He got off dang lucky."

Wendell had no sooner left Hattie's office

when Judge Tolliver minced in on the sides of his old boots, wiping his face with a big bandanna.

"We better work fas', Hattie," he choked out. "Adam Appleby is smellin' a rat besides himself. Caught him talkin' t' Jube Fogg awhile ago. That gent suspects somethin'. When kin we git Wendell an' Jennie married, huh?"

Hattie felt butterflies in her stomach.

"Jennie says not until four days from now, Judge, as she ain't got her trussow finished. You git a gun an' watch that Appleby polecat. Shoot t' kill if you catch any brib'ry goin' on. Now git out, as I got t' git some han'bills printed."

Milldew was strewn with the announcements before the next day at noon. They said boldly:

DEBUT OF WENDELL BUNCE, MILLDEW'S GIFT TO COWBOY CROONING. COME ONE, COME ALL! HEAR A VOICE WHICH WILL SWEEP AMERICA. MILLDEW GRAMMAR SCHOOL STADIUM. Saturday, Aug. 16th. 3:30 P.M. Adm. .50.

Hattie Pringle sat on the porch of the Milldew House perusing one of the handbills when Jube Fogg clumped up the steps.

"Don't get too rambunctious about that Bunce feller," Jube drawled, "I ain't lettin' Jennie marry the cuss if he don't git himself a job croonin' phonygraft records. He better make good. You know I wisht Eph Dilldock didn't pan out like he did. Kinda was partial t' the gent. Bacon's my favorite breakfas' dish."

"Wendell's got a voice," Hattie snapped.

"So've I, but it scares a houn' dog when I raise it," Jube said. "Feller named Appleby keeps askin' me questions, Hattie. Well, I ain't tellin' him right out about Purdy Shim. He kin wait until I git ready t' let it out meself. Hate t' be so cussed, but I got t' marry Jennie off. Can't keep meself; Elbie, three hun'ed head of stock an' Jennie. You see how it is, Hattie."

"You are a chiselin' polecat, Jube," Hattie said. "Wendell don't make good, I am stranglin' what voice he has left an' suin' a perfesser fer false advertisin'. An' if I ever git the goods on that Appleby, he'll wisht his ma never met his pa an' he got born. I'll go down in a awful crash but certain skunks won't be amongst the survivors."

"See you at the musical, Hattie," Jube Fogg said, and took his leave.

"Oh, bushwash," Hattie sighed. "I never got into such a skillet of smelts. It would be easier gettin' out of han' cuffs an' leg-irons after gittin' throwed into Goose Creek. Me an' Hoodinny, yep. I wisht tomorrer never did come like folks say. But then we wouldn't need no calendars an'—think I'll go talk t' Pete an' rest me weary ol' bones."

SATURDAY came as usual and at three in the afternoon, the Milldew school stadium was jammed. Folks came from near and far to hear the magic voice of Wendell Bunce. The mayor arrived, tripped over third base on the ball diamond, lost his silk hat and nearly choked himself to death with his cane. The Judge and Mrs. Tolliver arrived, as did Jube Fogg and Jennie. Last but not least, Adam Appleby stepped into the box next to Hattie's and immediately threw a verbal harpoon.

"I know he can't sing better'n a bullfrog," Adam scoffed. "Why are you so anxious t' git Jennie a husban', Fatty?"

"Keep your sassy mouth closed," Hattie countered. "Or I'll fill it full of me fist. A derby hat, huh? On that thing you calls a head? I've seen better on a glass of beer. One more peep outa you an' I'll crown you with me reticule, an' it's got a flatiron in it I was takin' t' git fixed."

Wendell Bunce arrived and mounted the wooden stage that had been built over home plate. There was a piano in a dead-axe wagon and Sophie Musselshell, Baptist Church organist, seated herself in front of it, and waited.

"Funny that perfesser didn' come t' hear his star pupil," Judge Tolliver grunted and glanced toward Hattie. "I got a funny feelin' that—"

"Shut up," Hattie snapped. "Or you'll git one that ain't funny. Shut up, as they're denouncin' Wendell."

They introduced Wendell as the protege of Milldew's foremost music lover, Hattie Pringle, and then called him the coming sensation in range crooning.

His first number was going to be The Cowboy's Lament.

Miss Musselshell began to play. Wendell opened his mouth and let go. Hattie's old hat skidded to the back of her head and a cigar flew out of the mayor's mouth.

"Oh-h-h-h-h-h, ba-a-ry me not on the lo-o-o-one prar-r-r-r-r-r-eeeeeee! Jus—"

There was no doubting the fact that Wendell had a voice. In fact he had four times as much lung power as the average mortal and his voice was a cross between an ocean liner's foghorn and the howling wind of a January blizzard. Old Ben Cuppy, who had worn an ear trumpet for thirty years, grinned wide, and threw the instrument away. People in the front seats stampeded to get out of the big wind.

Wendell's voice was as unbeautiful as it was loud. Dogs scampered out of the stadium and from somewhere off in the hills came a coyote's protesting yowl.

"Adios, Hattie," Jube Fogg said. "You tried danged hard."

"You think I'd marry that person?" Jennie tossed at Hattie as she made her exit. "He'd scare my children t' death!"

"I wouldn't think of leavin'," Appleby yelled. "I will set here an' enjoy life at its fullest, yep."

"Stop Wendell!" Hattie screeched. "He'll scare all the milk outa all the cows in the township! Oh, gobs, all is ruind. Milldew's shame'll come out—!"

A cabbage finally convinced Wendell Bunce that his musical career was cut short just after birth. The muskmelon intended for him, knocked a wig off Miss Sophie Musselshell's pate, and Adam Appleby and New Eden citizens writhed in convulsions of mirth.

"Where's the cops?" Hattie screamed. "Tell Milo Camby t' git order here or he kin bet he won't git elected ag'in as long as he lives!"

She saw something coming and ducked. It hit Judge Tolliver behind the ear and made a squishy sound. It was an egg that had long since curdled.

"Fifty cents fer this show," Appleby roared. "It's worth a dollar an' a half. More! More!"

Hattie lunged at him and pulled his derby down over his eyes, then thumped the crown of it with her fist.

"You'll laugh, hah?"

She booted Adam Appleby in the seat of his pants and the New Eden citizen went diving out onto the baseball diamond. Then people gasped. Some of them shouted. Hattie stared toward the gate. Pigs were coming on the run. All kinds of porkers. One big sow was trying to scale the fence. There were big and little and middle-sized pigs, white pigs and black pigs and multi-colored hams very much on the hoof!

AND the pigs kept coming. There must have been a good two hundred pigs in the stadium, all grunting and squealing with evident porcine delight. They converged on a frantic Wendell Bunce.

"Git it, Judge?" Hattie howled. "Wendell is the champion haw caller of the Universe an' didn't know it. He'll win prizes at country fairs an' git rich. Where's Jube?"

"Chase 'em!" Wendell screamed. "They'll eat me up, Hattie! Hattie—ha-a-ah!"

Hattie Pringle was not even mildly interested in Wendell's plight. She had singled out two pigs, the largest of the visitors that had answered the call. They were about the same size. Both had a black diamond patch on their backs.

"Judge," Hattie yelled. "Them two pigs got away, come from different places. One belongs t' Adam Appleby—both belong t' the skunk, by gobs! He fixed one up with hair dye an' framed Eph fer the hoosegow! Somebody git that New Eden smarty pants. Don't let him git away! He was s' tight-fisted an' mean he didn't plant his prize pig as he wanted t' keep his cake an' have Eph eat it too. Looks like we got him hooked. There he is! Grab the sidewinder!"

Milo Camby and Judge Tolliver seized Adam Appleby and hustled him over to where two of Milldew's citizens were trying to coax two big pigs away from the prostrate figure of a terrified Wendell Bunce.

"I believe the darlin's are tryin' t' kiss him," Hattie said, then whirled on Adam. "Look, you crooked yahoo! Two pigs with the same markin's. Where did you keep the real Black Diamond hid, you polecat? Well, Wendell's voice give it strength enough t' break loose, huh? Arrest him in the name of the law, Milo!"

"Huh? That voice even got it loose from the cellar?" Adam yipped without thinking. "Only one winder in it an' it's nine feet from the floor an' it was locked. Er—what am I sayin'? Don't you hit me, you fat cowbird, Hattie Pringle. I did it. I confess. I'll put in a counter suit fer assault if you throw that big rock!"

"Yep," the Judge said. "Put it down, Hattie, as the kids need secont base. The mangy critter owned up. Git a posse t' go after Eph Dilldock an' bring him back t' his loved ones, Milo. A hog callin' fool, this Wendell. He kin support Jennie now an'—"

"He will not!" an asthmatic voice cut through the confusion. "Eph is innercent an' my firs' love. I am goin' t' him an' ask fer forgiveness. Oh, my poor darlin'!"

"Looks like all Adams are alike. One give Ol' Eden a bad name," Hattie said and shoved Appleby toward the law's stoutest limb. "This one has about ruind New Eden. It'll be quite an eve in Milldew t'night, huh? Hey, Jube!"

"I'm here, Hattie," Jennie's pa said. "You did it, you ol' rip. Be callin' on you this evenin'. Sure glad it is goin' to be Eph Dilldock. Ah, I kin hear that bacon sizzlin' every mornin'—an' spareribs, Hattie! Come over fer dinner some night, huh?"

"Lowest crime rate in the State," Judge Tolliver grinned. "Most hones'—"

Hattie shuddered.

"Look, Judge, le's not take that campaign too serious, huh? It ain't much fun bein' too honest. We'll ballyhoo it a little more an' then kind of ease up, huh? When a body gits braggin' about how good somethin' is, it turns out bad.

"After all, Judge, nobody should brag about bein' good as that is what the Lord expects of us anyways. We had a narrer escape an' I couldn't live through another. I'm goin', over t' me office an' cuss me corns. Be sure you perfer charges legal ag'in Adam. Eph kin colleck plenty from the crumb fer false conviction an' nol prosser or ipso factus or somethin' like that."

Hattie was cooling her bare feet on the window sill of her office when Jube Fogg came in with the tax records.

"I never go back on my word, Hattie," he said. "Here's the evidence ag'in Purdy. Huh, always lookin' at that ugly pitcher. What did Pete have I ain't got, huh?"

"Me," Hattie Pringle said. "An' you never will."

●
NEXT ISSUE

BUTTERFLY RUSTLERS

Another Hilarious Hattie Pringle Story

By JOE ARCHIBALD

"Yes'm," Chet replied frankly. "When the right man comes along, a woman changes mighty quick."

A Complete Romantic Novelet

Tilda of the

CHAPTER I

Box D Pay-day

SHOUTING and shooting, the Box D bunch came rushing into the town of Sandy Bend for the monthly pay-day spree. They arrived shortly before the hour of nine, as if timing their arrival to the opening of the bank. They ran their lathered ponies off the trail and into the street, a wild bunch on the usual monthly tear—and at their head rode Tilda.

She rode her favorite pinto, who raced with his ears back and his nostrils distended. Ten other lathered ponies bearing cow-punchers were behind him. Tilda bent forward slightly in her saddle. She was yelling with the men, and her pearl-handled six-gun was tilted skyward as she fired wildly to let the citizens know that the Box D had come to town.

A Gun-Fast Mystery Man Sides the Girl Boss

"So you think the right man could tame me, do you, Mr. Burke?" Tilda asked, her voice flinty

Tomboy Spread

By JOHNSTON
McCULLEY

Tilda was a rather tall blonde, and well-built. She was twenty-one. She was vivacious and attractive more than beautiful. Dressed in buckskin riding breeches, a blue blouse with a buckskin jacket over it, fine riding boots, and a wide-brimmed felt sombrero kept on her head by a chin strap, she made a pretty picture as she rode.

Tilda owned the Box D, and had since the death of her father two years before after a lingering illness. She had refused to sell the outfit. With the aid of Hank Edmonds, her father's old foreman, she ran it. Nor was there anything so unusual about that. She knew ranch work as well as any man.

Tilda's father had hoped for a son, and had received a daughter. His wife had died within two years of Tilda's birth. So John Dorson had raised Tilda after the manner of a boy. As soon as she was able to cling to a saddle, she had a pony to ride. As she grew older, she learned to ride wild stock, to rope of the Box D in a Roaring Cowntown Feud!

like an expert, and shoot like a natural marksman. She knew all the tricks of the trade, did Tilda Dorson, and she was proud of the Box D.

It always had been a rough outfit. The bunkhouse crew did not count a weakling among them. A feud of many years' standing with Harvey Oakes and his X Dash outfit had been responsible for that.

The others in the Valley called the Box D the "Tomboy Spread." For Tilda ruled the outfit now with a hand of steel. No man could fool her as to ranch or range work. She was firm, but fair in her dealings with the men. They admired and respected her for her ability. You could get a fight out of a Box D man any time by suggesting that it must be obnoxious to work for a woman boss.

Now, the bunch rode madly past a row of cottages, sending clouds of fine dust toward them. They dashed into the small business section, passing the blacksmith shop first. Standing in the doorway there was a tall young stranger, and Tilda got a glance at him as they rode past. That was something to check on later, she thought. Possibly Harvey Oakes was importing a gun-fighter.

IN FRONT of the bank they skidded their ponies to an abrupt stop just as the banker was opening the door. Dismounting, laughing and shouting, they tethered their ponies to the hitch-rail there, got upon the walk and kicked the dust from their boots, and followed Tilda into the bank.

"Howdy, Mr. Lewiston!" Tilda greeted the banker. "Here we are again. Here's the list. Pay these galoots so they can hurry out and spend their money."

"Hello, Tilda," Lewiston greeted cordially. "I could hear you and your boys coming a mile away."

"We like to exercise our ponies and blow off steam."

The men lined up to get their pay according to the pay slip Tilda had given Lewiston. Tilda leaned against the wall and watched them proudly. They were her men!

There was Hank Edmonds, grizzled and wrinkled now, who had been her father's foreman for years. Behind him was Billy Huston, the youngest puncher with the outfit, a good-looking young fellow who fancied himself in love with Tilda. There was Lou Ashe, the quarrelsome bully, a bad man in a fight. Behind him was old "Daddy" Moser, the outfit's old-timer, who boasted that he had seen the first calf born in the valley, and probably had. And the others.

As they were getting their pay, Tilda wandered to the door and looked down the street. She was remembering the stranger she had noticed standing in the doorway at the blacksmith's shop. Well, she would soon learn something about him. Her pony had cast a shoe as they had entered the town, and she had a legitimate reason for visiting the blacksmith promptly.

She turned away from the door as pounding boots told her the men had their pay and were about to leave.

"Behave yourselves, now," Tilda said, and laughed while they responded with grins. "Anybody so drunk he can't climb into his saddle and start for home at sunset will be fired! Don't shoot out too many windows, because I always have to pay for them. Leave the town men alone and don't pick fights. And keep away from that blond waitress at the restaurant. Get goin'!"

They grinned again and filed past her, to start down the street toward the saloon. But they would not spend their entire day drinking and playing poker. Some of them were sensible. They would buy things at the store, and go to the restaurant for a mid-day meal, and buy hard candy to take back to the Box D with them.

Tilda watched them a moment, then untied her pony and swung up into saddle. With the pony at a walk, she went back down the street. His hoofs made little noise as they struck into the deep velvety dust.

As she neared the blacksmith shop she could hear Ed Carew, the blacksmith, talking to the stranger.

"She's a great girl," Carew was saying, "but as wild as yuh'll find 'em. They call the old Box D the Tomboy Spread, and Tilda is the tomboy. But she has her troubles. Harvey Oakes of the X Dash didn't stop the feud when Tilda's father died."

"Mean to say this Harvey Oakes would fight a woman?" the stranger cut in. Tilda liked his drawling voice.

"He's fightin' a ragin', r'arin' outfit. It only happens that a girl is the boss of it now. I've told yuh all about the old trouble. If yuh're lookin' for a job, yuh can't do better than the Box D."

"I'll do some thinkin' about it," the stranger replied.

"Yuh needn't be scared of Tilda."

"Oh, I'm not. Maybe she's wild, but when the right man comes along he'll tame her quick enough."

"A few jaspers have tried to make up to her, and got their ears burned off," Carew informed him.

"I said the right man."

Tilda had dismounted quietly and led her pony to the wide open doorway. Now her shadow darkened it.

"If you two gentlemen are through concerning yourselves with me and my affairs, maybe you can attend to business, Ed Carew," she snapped, her eyes flashing. "My pony's thrown a shoe. Fix him up."

"Shore, Tilda, shore," Carew replied hastily, gulping in embarrassment. "I was just tellin' Mr. Burke about the folks in the valley. He came ridin' in yesterday, and he's a stranger here. Mr. Chet Burke is his name."

Tilda turned to look at Chet Burke. He was standing stiffly erect. Tall and slender, with dark hair and eyes, a capable-looking man of perhaps thirty, Tilda judged. She looked him up and down as if he had been a horse offered for sale.

"So you think the right man could tame me, do you, Mr. Burke?" she asked, her voice a trifle flinty.

A WISP of a smile appeared on his lips:

"Yes'm," he replied frankly. "What I meant, ma'am, is this—sometimes a woman acts manlike in her ways, and seems to be rough and all that, but she never forgets that she's a woman. And when the right man comes along, she remembers it more than ever, and changes mighty quick."

"Do you think perhaps that you might be the right man?"

"Haven't been thinkin' about that at all," Burke told her.

"Lookin' for a job?" she asked.

"Maybe so."

"All right. There's an empty bunk in my bunkhouse. We'll start for home at sunset."

"Whoa, now!" Burke protested. "I haven't said yet that I'd take the job, Miss Dorson."

"No? Could it be possible, Mr. Burke, that you already have one—with Harvey Oakes of the X Dash? The way your holster hangs and the position of your gun show me you know how to sling lead and do it quick."

"I reckon I do," Burke admitted. "I've been accused of being right good at it."

"It's entirely possible—me knowing the cuss well," said Tilda, "that Oakes is importing a gun-fighter. Do you want a job with the Box D, or not?"

"I'll think it over, ma'am, and let you know before sunset. I haven't been in Sandy Bend long enough to know my way around. Me, I never jump at anything. I've found that the man who jumps into things too quick generally finds he's jumped right into trouble."

"If you sign on with Harvey Oakes as a gunman, you'll jump right into trouble, all right!" Tilda warned. "We've been having things a little quiet lately, what with the sheriff making the two outfits pay off on different dates to keep Oakes' boys and mine apart. And no imported gunman is going to start a ruckus!"

She gestured toward Ed Carew and her pony, and turned to hurry down the street. She walked with a snappy stride that denoted a measure of anger and made her sombrero bob every time one of her boots struck the ground.

CHAPTER II

Unwilling Cowhand

AT THE store, Tilda made several purchases and ordered them put into a bundle so one of the men could carry it on his saddle. She visited a couple of housewives in the town and remained at one place for the mid-day meal, exchanging gossip. Though a tomboy all her life, Tilda was a favorite with the women.

Down on the street, the men of the Tomboy Spread were having their usual fling. They patronized the saloon, played some poker, bought stuff at the store, and dozed at intervals. It was late in the afternoon when Tilda went back to the store to buy something she had forgotten.

Chet Burke was standing in front of the barber shop, in which old Daddy Moser was getting his whiskers trimmed. Tilda eyed Chet as she neared him. He turned and saw her, and touched the brim of his hat by way of salute.

"Made up your mind yet whether you want to work for the Box D?" Tilda asked.

"Not yet. It isn't sunset yet, either. I said I'd let you know by sunset."

Tilda braced her fists against her hips.

"You're afraid," she said. "You know I heard you tell Carew that the right man could tame me, and of course you were thinking of yourself as the right man. And you know you couldn't make good, so you won't take a job on the Box D."

Chet grinned at her. "Now," he said, "you're tryin' to make me work for you with a line of talk like that. Why do you want me to work for you?"

"I need a good fighting man. And if you're working for the Box D, you won't be working for the X Dash. We can use a gunman as well as Harvey Oakes can."

"If I take a job," he said, "it'll be as a cow-hand, not as a gun-fighter."

"So I have to wait until sunset to get an answer?" she asked. "When it comes, it'll probably be 'no'. First time I ever begged a man to work for me. Most would break their necks to unroll their blankets in the Box D bunkhouse."

She started to say something more, decided against it, tossed her head and glared at him, and went on along the street toward the store.

This Chet Burke disturbed her, she decided. While she had been visiting the town women and eating dinner, a vision of him had been before her constantly, and she could even imagine hearing the sound of his voice. Maybe it was a warning, she thought. She was a great believer in intuition. Maybe some unknown force was telling her to beware Chet Burke. That, of course, to her way of thinking, could mean only that he was destined to work for Harvey Oakes, that he was a gunman who had been ordered to report. Possibly he was in town now to spy on the Box D men.

She saw Lou Ashe, the bully of her outfit, emerge from the saloon, and beckoned him.

"Notice that stranger in front of the barber shop?" she asked. "He's got me worried. Offered him a job, and he's slow to take me up. When we leave for home at sunset, he's to go along. Understand?"

"He'll go along," Ashe promised her.

"Be careful. I think he's a lead-slinger. But get some of the boys and grab him just before we leave, unless I tell you differently before that. His horse and outfit are in the town stable. Got it?"

"I've got it, Tilda," Ashe said, grinning. "I'll get some of the boys, and we'll corral and hogtie the buzzard. We'll try to make his acquaintance and have him in hand before sunset."

"Understand one thing," Tilda said. "I don't want him roughed up. I've got a reason behind this. Just grab him without hurting him, get his horse, put him in the saddle and see that he stays there until we get home."

Ashe grinned and turned back toward the saloon to pick out some of the men to help him. Tilda went on to the store to make her last-minute purchase and gossip with some women customers who had dropped in.

It was an hour before sunset when she emerged. She meant to go to the blacksmith shop and get her pony. Lou Ashe and young Billy Huston met her on the walk.

"The cuss wouldn't make up with us at all," Ashe reported. "Tried to buy him a drink, but he said he didn't drink with strangers. Wouldn't play poker, either. Mysterious cuss."

"Where is he now?" asked the girl.

"Just got himself a haircut, and he's in front of the barber shop again."

"All right!" Tilda said, her eyes snapping. "When you see me come riding back, grab him. Watch yourselves! He may be right handy with a gun, and even with his fists. Pretend you're getting your ponies."

"His pony is at the stable, all right, and after we grab him we'll make the stableman saddle the nag and lash him in the saddle. We'll handle it, Tilda."

She marched along the walk, going toward the blacksmith shop. Chet Burke was standing in front of the barber's place again, whittling a stick.

"Make up your mind yet?" Tilda asked him.

"Yeah. Thanks for your offer, ma'am, but I ain't takin' it up right now. I'm resting a few days and figuring out the situation in the valley. If I decide to work for your Box D, I'll come riding out in three, four days. If you've found a man meanwhile, it'll be all right."

TILDA had a feeling of disappointment, and couldn't understand it. Men usually came around begging to work for her. Usual wages, but the best grub in the valley, and plenty of men to share the work. She glared at Chet again and marched on to the blacksmith shop.

Her pony was ready. Tilda chatted with the blacksmith and tried to pump him about this Chet Burke, but the blacksmith knew nothing. He had come riding into town the afternoon before, and didn't talk much. Had a good pony and a fat blanket-roll. Seemed to have plenty of pocket money. Didn't drink much and refused to play cards.

Tilda swung to her saddle and looked down the street. That was a signal. She saw the Box D men come up the walk in a body, talking and laughing.

"There's the boss, ready to hit for home," she heard Lou Ashe say. "Let's get our ponies."

They came swaggering on toward where Chet was standing in front of the barber shop. Their ponies were at the rail in front of the bank just across the street. They had been there all day except when the men had taken them to the watering trough and given them a noon feed.

Tilda rode toward them slowly, watching. In an instant Chet Burke, she saw, found himself in the center of something like a cyclone. Legs and arms were flying in every direction. Tilda saw one of the men shot out of the group to land in the dust of the street.

Then they had Chet down, and when they lifted him again and slapped his hat on his head his wrists were tied in front of him. Three of the men forced him along the walk. Another ran to the stable to pay Chet's bill and get his pony and blanket-roll. The stableman thought it was a bit irregular, but knew better than to oppose men of the Tomboy Spread when they were on a rampage.

Tilda waited until Chet had been lashed in his saddle and the reins put into his hands. Even with his wrists tied, he could handle his pony. He was quiet, not howling maledictions. Tilda motioned, and wheeled the pony to start for home. The others followed, bringing their prisoner.

She did not look back until they were a mile out of town, and then only because she heard hoofbeats behind her. Lou Ashe and Billy Huston were riding to catch up with her.

"He's some scrapper, but wasn't lookin' for trouble," Ashe reported. "We got him without much of a fuss."

"What did he say?" she wanted to know.

"Said the Box D must need a puncher mighty bad to kidnap one. Didn't do any cussin'. Said you needed tamin'."

"Oh, he did?"

"Yeah. He's quiet now. Maybe he thinks he's storin' his rage and waitin' his time. He'll probably jump on me for this, first chance he gets. I'll be watchin'. If he makes a move at me, I'll slap back his ears."

"Aw, Tilda, what yuh want to mess around with the critter for?" Billy Huston put in.

"I've got my reasons, Billy. Had an idea he might have been one of Harvey Oakes' hired men."

"In that case," Billy said, "he'd have jumped at the chance to work for you, thinking he'd be on the inside and could spy."

"Maybe not," she replied. "He may have had other plans. You boys go back and keep watch on him. What did Hank Edmonds say?"

Tilda was always afraid of going too far in her escapades and getting criticism from her fathers' old foreman, a man she respected greatly.

"Hank just laughed and said it wasn't any of his business," Ashe reported. "Said if you was crazy about a man that was one way to get him."

"Oh, he did?" Tilda said threateningly. "You wait till I have a minute alone with Hank! Tell Daddy Moser to come ride with me."

They rode back, and the old-timer galloped forward and jogged along beside her. He had known Tilda from the day of her birth. She went to him in confidence with her troubles, or to Ma Finch, the old housekeeper. Both gave her valuable advice.

The sunset turned to the soft dusk, then a bright moon peeped above the hills. They rode on, silent except when some of the men sang snatches of song. And finally they loped down the lane at the Box D and stopped at the house corral and dismounted. Chet Burke was untied and lifted from his saddle.

"Turn his pony into the corral," Tilda ordered. "Take him to the bunkhouse and make him comfortable. Take him with you to the grub shack and let him fill up. Don't let him get hold of a gun. Watch him tonight. I'll talk to him in the morning, but I'll say a few words now."

She strode forward, slapping her leg with her riding quirt. For a moment, their eyes met. Chet grinned slightly.

"Well, here you are on the Box D," Tilda said. "I'm putting you on the pay-roll now. Make yourself comfortable. Hank Edmonds, my foreman, will handle you the same as the other men. Only don't try to get away. You've got a job to do here. You're going to tame me—remember?"

CHET BURKE put up no resistance. The following day he accepted orders from Hank Edmonds and did the work expected of him, and for days after that. Acting on Tilda's order, Hank always kept another man with Chet. But nothing suspicious happened.

It was a disappointment to some of the men, especially Lou Ashe. They had expected Chet to put up a battle or try to escape. And the way he went about his duties with a whimsical smile on his face had them bothered. He acted like a man who knew a secret they did not.

Tilda avoided him those first few days, but she talked about him considerably to Ma Finch and Daddy Moser.

"You're getting mighty interested in that young man, Tilda," Ma Finch told her, as she prepared pie crust.

"I'm not. It's just that I can't make him out. He's a puzzle."

"When a girl starts to solving a man puzzle, she's half-way to the altar," said Ma. "She'll marry the critter and spend a lifetime with him just trying to solve him."

"You hush that kind of talk, Ma!" Tilda exploded.

Daddy Moser reported to her: "He does his work, but he's kind of crude in some things, like he wasn't a good general all-around ranch hand. He shore can ride, though, and rope quite some. Ain't seen him sling hardware yet, though Hank Edmonds let him have his gun."

Chet had been there about ten days before Tilda even spoke to him, though she did a lot of watching from the distance. Then there came an afternoon when the men came riding in from the range and were turning their ponies into the corral, and Tilda left the house and started walking toward them. Daddy Moser had warned her that Ashe was commencing to taunt and belittle Chet, as he always did a new man, trying to pick a fight and show himself the boss of the bunkhouse.

Tilda was watching some calves in the distance, but jerked her head around quickly when she heard loud voices. Ashe was standing in front of Chet with his fists planted against his hips and his body balanced on the balls of his feet, a position for a quick attack.

"Ashe, you've been picking on me for days," Tilda heard Chet say in a soft drawl, without the least excitement in it. "It's time for you to quit. You're aiming to pick a fight. I've seen bunkhouse bullies like you before."

"So I'm a bunkhouse bully, am I?" Ashe howled.

"That's my opinion."

"I'll soon make you change it!"

Ashe launched himself forward as he spoke, his fists swinging. But this time he did not catch a victim entirely off guard, as he did usually. Chet sidestepped with the swiftness of a rattlesnake preparing to strike and let Ashe charge past. And when Ashe came charging back he was stopped with a fist in his face.

Then they were facing each other, toe to toe, and hammering it out. Tilda went forward a short distance and leaned against a tree to watch. She never interfered in the quarrels of the men.

She had seen plenty of fist fights, and gun-fights, too.

Daddy Moser came to her. "Ashe has been askin' for it," Daddy squeaked. "Hope Chet trims him good. It's time Ashe was taken down a peg."

"What is the quarrel about?" the girl asked.

"Nothin' much. Ashe has been pickin' on him and blamin' him for this and that, just pickin' a fight."

"He's getting one," Tilda observed, as she saw Ashe reel back from a blow. "What do you think of Chet Burke, Daddy?"

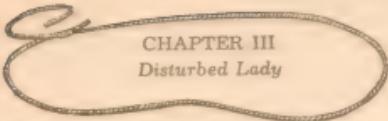

"He's a man for my money. Seems balanced. Quiet. Don't gripe about everything, like some of 'em do."

"Does he ever say anything about himself?"

"Not much, and I reckon he opens up to me more'n to any of the others. I gathered that he'd been workin' somewheres down along the Border."

"Do you think he's an X Dash man, maybe a spy of Harvey Oakes?" Tilda asked.

"If he is," said Daddy Moser, "he's mighty clever about it. He don't talk much. Never asks any questions except about his work."

CHAPTER III
Disturbed Lady

LOU ASHE was trying to batter Chet down now, Tilda saw, but this time something went wrong with Ashe's system. Chet refused to be battered down. His face had been cut, for he had not escaped damage entirely. But Ashe was in a worse condition.

Hank Edmonds, the foreman, glanced toward Tilda as if for orders to stop the fight, but she shook her head. Ashe bored in again. Tilda could hear the thud of Chet's fists as he got inside Ashe's guard. Then the bunkhouse bully suddenly sank to the ground and sprawled.

Tilda started forward, but stopped abruptly when she saw Chet whip his gun out of its holster.

"Get up!" he told Ashe. "Help him to his feet, somebody."

Two of the men helped Ashe up, and one threw a bucket of water on him, carrying the water from the nearby well. Ashe shook his bloody head.

"You listen to me, Ashe!" Chet ordered. "You've been wantin' a fight, and you've had one. That ends it, far as I'm concerned. I know men like you. Don't bear a grudge against me, Ashe. And don't try any stuff with yore gun. You watch."

Chet looked around, still holding the six-gun down at his side. Down at the corner of the bunkhouse was an empty oil tin. It was a trifle too far for usual effective gun-shooting. But Chet swung up his gun and let fly.

Four blasts roared aloud as one. The empty can was smashed up against the rock foundation of the bunkhouse.

"Somebody get it," Chet suggested.

Billy Huston ran and got the can. Four holes were in it so close together that a playing card could have covered them. And at that distance.

"Watch again!" Chet ordered Ashe.

He ejected the spent cartridges, put in fresh shells, and slapped the gun into its holster.

"You see the left gate post on the corral, huh?" Chet asked. "And in this opposite direction you see the ranchhouse bell, don't you? Watch!"

He stood quiet a moment, then his right hand flashed. The gun cleared leather with a speed that astounded the watchers. It roared twice. A chip of wood flew from the corral post, and the second bullet rang the bell in the opposite direction.

"I'm not aimin' to brag," Chet said quietly. "I'm just showin' you, Ashe. You'd better think twice before you come gunning for me. That's all!"

Then Tilda signaled, and the old foreman stepped forward.

"That's enough!" Hank Edmonds snapped. "Break it up. A couple of yuh take Ashe to the bunkhouse and help fix up his face. And you better—" he started to say to Chet.

But Tilda motioned again and hurried toward the group as Ashe was led away between two of the men. She stopped beside Chet and looked him up and down.

"Pretty handy with your fists, and also with a gun, Mr. Burke," she said. "That's the kind of a man I want on the Box D. Come up to the house and let Ma Finch fix your face."

"I can do that in the bunkhouse, thanks," he said.

"You'll do as I say," ordered Tilda. "You keep away from Ashe until you both cool off. Come with me."

He walked along beside her, a little shaky yet from the fight. She eyed him, but said nothing. In the kitchen, Ma Finch got salve and a clean cloth and applied the salve to his face, and gave him a piece of fresh meat for his swollen eye. Having done that, she hurried to another part of the house to attend to imaginary duties, being a wise old lady.

"How do you like it on the Box D?" Tilda asked.

"It's a mighty fine outfit."

"You don't have to stay any longer, if you want to leave."

He grinned. "Shucks! I could have left any time. The gang couldn't have kept me here against my will."

"You want to stay on, then?"

"Sure—unless you fire me. I'm satisfied for the present."

"Thought you were going to tame me?" she taunted. "You havent even made an effort to speak to me."

"You're being tamed, maybe, without knowing it," he drawled.

"I certainly don't know it if I am," Tilda snapped at him.

"You know somethin', Boss?" he asked. "I'm not aimin' to be fresh when I say it, understand. But you're a mighty pleasant and pretty girl."

"None of that now!" Tilda warned.

"I'm meaning it sincere, please understand. I've seen a lot of folks in my time, and learned to judge 'em. I like you a heap. You've got spunk, and you sure know cow-raisin' business. That's what I'm meaning to say."

"You've said it," Tilda replied, trying to make her voice hard and failing miserably. "Maybe you'd better go to the bunkhouse now. But no more trouble with Ashe. Only, you'd be wise to watch him. He'll try to get square with you some way for the beating you gave him."

SHE walked to the kitchen door with him and opened it. They went down the steps, just in time to see one of the men come riding in on a lathered and almost exhausted pony. The rider was yelling something, and Tilda started running toward the corral with Chet beside her.

"Harvey Oakes is at it again!" the man was shouting. "I found a calf that had been shot. The new fence is smashed in a couple of places. Oakes will be saying our cattle did it to get to his creek. But I found where the wire had been cut and a post rooted out. No cattle did that."

So the old feud between the Box D and the X Dash began anew.

In the morning Tilda rode out to the line fence with more than half the men. Her father had built that long fence at huge expense to separate his land from Harvey Oakes' acreage. A creek on the Oakes' land wandered within a hundred yards of the fence at that point, and Box D cattle went to water there instead of traveling a quarter of a mile to the Box D's own creek, the cattle having no sense of property lines and water rights.

Hank Edmonds rode beside Tilda, and the men were bunched behind. Ashe had been left at the ranch, but Chet Burke and Billy Huston were with the cavalcade. As they neared the place where the fence was down, they watched the terrain carefully, but could see nobody.

They dismounted and examined the fence. Without doubt, human hands had made the break to let the cattle through. Then one calf had been shot and the remainder of the cattle driven back. Hoofprints left by horses mingled with those of the cattle.

One of the men spoke sharply, and they looked up to see Harvey Oakes riding down the hillside toward the break with four of his men. Oakes was carrying a white rag fastened to a stick.

"Climb into yore saddles, everybody," old Hank Edmonds ordered. "Don't make the first move, but be ready for trouble. I wouldn't trust that sneaky Harvey Oakes as far as I could toss a bull by his tail. Known him for years and don't know any good about him."

They mounted and waited, the men with hands straying nervously near the butts of their guns. Oakes and his men rode forward slowly and stopped on the near side of the creek.

"I'm right glad you're here, Miss Dorson," he called to Tilda. "Now, you can see for myself."

"That's right, Oakes," she snapped back at him. "I can see for myself. I can see where somebody rooted up a couple of posts and cut several strands of wire so the cattle could get through. I can see horses' hoofprints among the ones the cattle left in the muddy ground. Everything is plain, Oakes."

"Are you accusin' me of playin' tricks like that?"

"I'm just tellin' you what I can see for myself, Oakes," Tilda told him. "My men are here to repair the fence, and from now on it'll be watched. I hope you had a lot of fun killing one poor little calf."

Oakes flared up at that. "I did it as a warning," he said. "It'd have served you right if we'd shot about a dozen of your steers. I'm warning you again—I'll kill any of your cattle that break through and get on my land. I need this water for my own stock. The creek's low."

"Save your breath," Tilda interrupted. "We've both been warned by the sheriff about starting trouble again. I won't start it, but if you do my boys will be right there to meet you. Good morning, Mr. Oakes. We're busy."

Oakes and his men turned their mounts and rode over the brow of the hill and disappeared. Tilda looked around at the men. She had thought Chet was right behind her, but he was not. He had remained dismounted, and was more than half concealed behind a big rock.

Hank Edmonds began barking orders, so Tilda turned to watch the men repair the fence, and forgot the incident. The men worked hard, reset the posts, repaired the cut wire, got everything tight.

"I'm goin' to keep a guard of two men along this fence day and night," Edmonds told Tilda.

He detailed two men, named a relief for the night, and the others rode back to the ranch.

Chet was riding beside Billy Huston and talking to him, so Tilda did not speak to him again just then. She was thinking principally about possible serious trouble with Oakes' outfit. She wished the old feud could end forever. There wasn't any sense in it, she told herself. Neighbors should be neighbors.

But Harvey Oakes was a sour bachelor of middle age. Probably born sour, Tilda thought. He always had been a trouble-maker. He had had bad luck for the last few years, and his herds were not all they should be. And he blamed everybody but himself for it. . . .

For ten days, Hank Edmonds kept day and night guards along the fence near the creek. But no X Dash riders were seen except in the distance. No Oakes cattle grazed along that part of the creek.

"They'll be breakin' loose one of these days—or nights," Edmonds made prophecy. "Oakes is waitin' to catch us off guard, meb-be."

TILDA had occasional conversations with Chet Burke these days. She rode with him out to the fence one afternoon, for she wanted to look over the situation herself. He talked freely, but little of himself and his past, and Tilda could not draw him out.

That made her angry. What was the matter with him? Was he on the run from some Border sheriff, or just naturally dumb? She told herself instantly that he wasn't dumb. He was intelligent in his talk. He betrayed that he was fairly well-educated.

"You haven't been a cowboy all your life," she accused that afternoon. "You're nearly thirty at least, and if you've been a cowboy all your life you'd be a lot handier about some things. I've been watching you. You're one of these men of mystery."

Chet grinned. "You like to solve mysteries?"

"I almost forgot that you were going to tame me," she said.

"You're gettin' tamer every day, Tilda." They were looking each other by their first names nowadays.

They rode along the fence, talked to the guards, who were stationed a mile apart, and then dismounted to rest in the shade of a lone tree. Their ground-hitched ponies nibbled the sparse grass.

"You know something?" Chet asked. "I'd like to see you sometime with yore hair all fluffed out, and a dress—maybe a light blue one to match yore eyes. A soft, swaying dress."

"Oh, you would?" she said shortly.

"Yes'm. But maybe that better not happen. I'm liking you a heap as it is, and if I saw you like I said I might go loco."

She looked at him swiftly and met his ardent gaze. There was no mistaking the sincerity in it. Tilda felt herself flushing, and that maddened her.

"Keep your talk for the waitress in the Sandy Bend restaurant," she suggested.

"But she's not the kind I like," he protested. "I like you. I'm really meaning it."

"Let's mount and get riding," she snapped, embarrassed. She turned to catch up her pony.

Chet caught up his own and had to spur to catch up with her. She was calm again by the time he did, and they rode back to the ranch with few words between them. Tilda hurried to the house, and Chet went to mend a bridle.

In the house, Tilda went to her own room and threw herself upon her bed. She was disturbed. Other men had spoken softly to her, but had caused no reaction except that of anger, if they persisted. And her present reaction was not one of anger.

"I wonder if I'm falling in love with him?" she mused. "That would be a joke! Don't know much of anything about him. Be silly of me to do a thing like that just because he's good-looking. I've met a lot of good-looking men in my time, and they never caused me a shiver. Shucks!"

CHAPTER IV Oakes' Nephew

TILDA walked to the bunkhouse in the dusk after the evening meal to have a talk with Hank Edmonds about ranch work. Chet was sitting on a bench outside the door, smoking a cigarette and looking at the moon. He got up when he saw her coming.

"Keep your seat," she snapped at him. "I just want to see Hank."

Edmonds had a private room in the bunkhouse, for he liked to keep close watch on the men. When Tilda had concluded her business with him, she emerged to return to the house. Chet was not on the bench. Daddy Moser was waiting to walk up to the house with her. Somehow, she had a sense of disappointment.

"Tilda," Daddy reported, "I've been keepin' an eye on that young Chet, like yuh suggested. I can't see nothin' wrong with him. Mebbe a mite quiet, but that's all. He's a deep one, I reckon."

"Oh, he's all right, I guess, Daddy."

"Yuh're gettin' interested in him. I can see it."

"Stop that, now. You're as bad as Ma Flint. Keep your mind on ranch business and Harvey Oakes."

"Oakes!" the old-timer flared. "It's about time for that pesky critter to make a bad move, if he aims to make one. He's been bidin' his time, if yuh're askin' me."

"Thanks, Daddy. I'll go on to the house now. You get back and get your sleep."

He turned back, and Tilda wandered on. She walked slowly, watching the clouds swim around the moon. She couldn't understand herself. She seemed to be getting soft. She wondered how she would look in a pretty dress and with her hair fluffed up.

"Tilda!" a voice called softly.

There he was, in the shadow of the big tree at the corner of the front porch. She came to an abrupt stop.

"Hope I didn't scare you by speakin'," he said. "I was waiting here to see you alone a minute."

"About what?" she asked, trying to be stern and businesslike.

"About what I said. I—I didn't mean to be fresh. What I said this afternoon, I mean."

"That's all right. Forget it."

"But I don't want to forget it and don't aim to," he protested. "You can fire me if you like, but I've got a piece to speak. I liked you the first time I set eyes on you in town. Since I've been here, I'm liking you more and more. I meant to come to work on the Box D all the time, but wanted to hang around town and learn some things before I started. I'm right glad you had me kidnaped."

"Why tell me all this?" she asked. Her voice was shaking a little.

He moved closer, and Tilda seemed frozen in her tracks. She didn't even lift her arms.

"You can fire me and send me away," he said, "but it's the truth I'm telling you. I love you, honey. It's been growing on me day by day, how much I love you."

"Why, how—how dare you! I don't know anything about you. Maybe you're a range tramp, or a wanted man."

"Oh, I'm all right that way!" he assured.

"Modest, too," she scoffed. "Maybe the moon has made you mad."

He bent over her. "If you knew I was all right in every way, and had a right to ask a girl like you to marry me—"

"This has gone far enough, Chet. Go back to the bunkhouse. I'll not fire you—this time. But no more of this foolishness!"

Gathering her strength, she brushed past him and hurried into the house.

In bed a little later, she stretched sleeplessly. She couldn't get Chet out of her mind. She could hear his voice, see his face in the dark. It was ridiculous, she declared to herself.

And then the thought came to her—perhaps this was all a trick of his to tame her, as he said he would. Clever! That was it! She could see through it now!

So she turned over and went to sleep. . . .

It happened the next day.

Chet was one of the guards assigned to the fence, and Lou Ashe the other. When they were relieved and came riding in at sunset, Ashe made straight for the house, pulling Hank Edmonds along with him.

"Well, I've got proof now," Ashe declared. "Chet Burke was down by the creek and I was up on the brow of the hill. What'll you think when I tell you I saw Harvey Oakes ride down to the fence by the creek and have a long talk with Burke? Then Oakes rode away and Burke went back to his post."

"I can't believe it!" Tilda said.

"He's in the bunkhouse. Face him with it in front of the other men and watch how he acts. I always was suspicious of that cuss. Thought he was one of Oakes' men."

Tilda's face was grim and set as she went with them to the bunkhouse. When they entered, the men sensed something was wrong and grew silent. Chet was putting blankets into his bunk, and they called him.

IN A few words, Tilda told him what Ashe had said.

"Of course it would be Ashe," he told her, his lips twisting in the smile she liked.

"You admit you had a long talk with Oakes?" she demanded.

"Sure. Must have talked half an hour there by the fence. Why not? He's my uncle."

"Your uncle!" she cried.

"Why, you—" Hank Edmonds started toward him, but Tilda motioned him back.

"Got anything more to say, Chet?" she asked.

"Yeah. Reckon you've got an explanation due. Oakes was my mother's brother. My parents are both dead. I haven't seen Oakes since I was about ten. He never helped after my father died. My mother had a hard time getting along, but my uncle never helped."

"What else?" Tilda urged, watching his face.

"I was working down on the Border, and quit my job and thought I'd ride up this away and see what the country looked like. Thought I might take a look at my uncle, too. You met me in town and had me kidnaped, and here I've been ever since. He learned I was here, and saw me today and came riding down to talk to me. Said he knew me because I looked like my mother."

"He talked to you about what?" Tilda asked.

"Well, he told his side of the case, and said how, us being close relatives and all, I should help him. Wanted me to spy out the land over here and send him reports about everything. Planned to have me turn against you if there was a ruckus."

"That's enough!" one of the men roared. "Say the word, Tilda, and we'll handle this cussed spy! I always thought there was somethin' wrong with him. We'll give him a beatin' and load him on his pony with his blanket-roll around his neck!"

Tilda's gesture stopped him. She looked Chet straight in the eyes, and he met her level gaze.

"He's all right," Tilda decided.

"Are you crazy?" another man shouted at her. "An Oakes spy right in your own bunkhouse, and him a nephew of that pest of a Harvey Oakes?"

"I'm still owner of the Box D," Tilda said. "I'm taking a chance that Chet is all right. If anybody doesn't like my decision, he can call at the house for his time."

Leaving them dumbfounded and shocked to silence, she turned and walked to the door, stopping there to beckon Chet to step outside with her.

"I think you're loyal to me, Chet," she said. "I'm taking a chance on you. Don't make me the laughing-stock of the range."

He walked with her for a short distance.

"You can take a chance on me," he said.

"All I said last night—I meant it, and I'm still meaning it."

"All right. Go back and act as if nothing has happened. Hank Edmonds will see that you're not bothered."

He turned back, and Tilda walked out. Suddenly she found Billy Huston confronting her. He had slipped out of the bunkhouse to wait until she started up to the house.

"What is it, Billy?" she asked.

"You love that jasper, don't you?" he said. "You wouldn't take such a chance trusting him if you didn't. I—I've been loving you for a long time, Tilda. But I'm not man enough for you. I'm only a boy yuh might say. I'd never fit in as your husband, even if you'd have me. I just want to say I think Chet is all right. But I'll be watching. If he turns against you I'll be on hand to help."

"Thanks, Billy." Tilda grasped his hand a moment, then hurried on to the house.

After she had gone to bed, she did considerable thinking about the situation. She admitted to herself now that she was in love with Chet Burke. And she realized what a chance she was taking, and how it must have looked to the other men.

She felt sure Chet was true and loyal. But suppose he was not? Suppose he really was playing his uncle's game? Suppose he got her to confess her love for him, then spurned her and laughed. That would be a triumph for Harvey Oakes over the Dorson clan.

"I know Chet's all right!" she told herself fiercely. "I know!"

Ma Finch eyed her in the kitchen in the morning. A girl couldn't fool Ma Finch.

"Honey, I've heard the men talking, and I've done a lot of guessing," Ma said.

"You've got to make that man prove himself first chance you get. I've been watchin you fall in love with him."

"I reckon I have, Ma," Tilda confessed.

"He strikes me as being a right good young man, the kind that'd make a girl a good husband. Maybe he ain't got anything but his pony and blanket-roll, but what's the difference? You need a man on the Box D—a man of your own, to talk things over with all the time. Hank Edmonds is getting old. The boys are all right. But a big ranch like this . . . Well, there should be a man to help you do the bossin'."

"Everything will be all right, Ma," Tilda told her.

"I'm hopin' so, honey."

AFTER breakfast, Tilda went out to see the men starting off for their day's work. Edmonds was assigning duties. Two rode away to relieve the fence guards. Some were to go on the range and others to work around the buildings. Some of the sheds were being painted, and Tilda saw Chet assigned to that work.

After the men had gone about their duties, Tilda wandered down to where Chet was working on a tool shed behind the big barn. He faced her soberly.

"I want to thank you for trusting me," he said. "Most folks wouldn't have done it under the circumstances."

"I did it because—well, Chet, because I believe some of the things you said. About loving me, I mean."

"I do, honey."

"I wish I could be sure."

"Yuh mean that if yuh were sure, it would make a difference?"

"That's all I'm saying now, Chet. I've got to think it out. I've got to know. If you fooled me—"

"I'd never fool you."

"I've got to be sure," she said, turned and fled from him to the house.

At noon, one of the fence guards came riding like a wild man toward the ranch buildings, shouting and firing his six-gun. His pony was almost done when he pulled up at the corral. By that time, Tilda and all those on the ranch had gathered there.

"Oakes has started it!" the man yelled. "He's cuttin' the fence and lettin' our critters through, and shootin' 'em as fast as they make for the water. He burned my arm with a bullet, and he's shot Jake." Jake was the other fence guard.

Somebody raced to the ranch bell and sent its brassy tone clanging out across country. The men rushed to saddle their ponies. Hank Edmonds yelled for them to come to the bunkhouse for rifles and ammunition. Six-guns would not be enough for this.

Tilda saddled her own pony, buckled on her gun, and got into her saddle.

"You stay back!" Edmonds called to her.

"Not much!" she called back. "This is my fight. I'll be where Dad would be if he was still alive and well."

They rode away from the ranch at break-neck speed, leaving only Ma Finch and Daddy Moser behind.

CHAPTER V

Tame Woman

IT WAS more than two miles to the place where the fence was being opened. By the time the Box D outfit reached it, they had strung out. They could hear a shot now and then in the distance, and supposed the wounded guard was trying to pick off some of the X Dash men.

Topping the last hill with Chet Burke and Billy Huston, Tilda could get a view of the scene. Posts had been uprooted and the fence cut in several places. The cattle had streamed through. Half a dozen steers were dead on the ground, shot.

Some of the other men came up, and they charged down the slope straight toward the fence. The X Dash men began firing. The Box D people scattered to find cover for themselves and their jaded mounts.

Tilda found herself behind a huge rock with Billy Huston sprawled on the gravel beside her.

"You keep down, Tilda," Billy urged. "You don't want any part of this. The boys'll do your fightin'."

"It's my outfit, my job to help," she said tightly.

"To keep from gettin' hurt—that's yore job," Billy said finally.

"What are they doing now?" she asked.

Billy peered cautiously around the end of the rock.

"Them X Dash jaspers are under cover, too. They've shot a couple more of our steers. I reckon this is going to be a ruckus, all right. Oakes is asking for it."

"Our boys?" asked Tilda.

"Slinging a little lead but hitting nothing, I reckon. Somebody's got to make a move soon."

"Can you see Chet Burke?"

"He's behind that ledge of rock over to the right. Got his pony safe behind it. Gettin' ready to use a rifle. . . You love him a heap, huh?"

"I reckon I do, Billy."

"Then he'd better be right, or I'll get him for you, personal. I don't aim to stand by and see you hurt."

"You're a good boy, Billy," Tilda said.

Everything was quiet now. Then they heard Harvey Oakes' voice coming down wind to them.

"Hey! You Box D men! I've got my whole crew here, and they'll swear your own guards cut the fence so your cattle could get through and start the trouble! . . . Then you came chargin' and shootin' . . . We're defending ourselves . . . Go back, or we'll do some charging ourselves!"

Nobody answered him, but Tilda was thinking about what he had said. This might explain why Harvey Oakes had been quiet for so long. Perhaps he had made up some scheme to make it appear that the Box D was at fault, some yarn to tell the sheriff.

A chorus of wild yells came down wind. Billy Huston looked around the end of the rock again.

"Godfrey, they're coming!" he yelled. "Riding out from cover and charging toward the fence. They're aiming to make a regular battle of it."

Hank Edmonds was shouting orders. His men began opening fire as soon as the Oakes men crossed the fence line. One saddle was emptied in the first firing. The Oakes men scattered to cover behind rocks, as if the move had been prearranged.

Then somebody yelled, and they emerged and came on again. Some of the Box D men were climbing into their saddles, while the others remained under cover and fired at the elusive targets. The X Dash men were keeping a hail of bullets splattering against the rocks.

Tilda had been crouching behind the boulder. Now, Billy Huston poked his rifle around the end of the rock and began firing.

"Stop that, you young fool!" Chet Burke shouted at him. "You'll draw fire to Tilda!"

Tilda was holding her six-gun, but remained prone, waiting to use it only if she must. She could hear Hank Edmonds yelling again. The X Dash men, urged on by Oakes, had taken to cover again. Tilda understood the strategy now. They made a dash to cover, firing to cover the charge, rested, made another dash. The next move would bring them to a hand-to-hand clash.

The guns were still for a moment, and they heard Harvey Oakes' voice again.

"I'm willin' to quit now, if you'll make a deal! I know Tilda Dorson is with you. She can hear me, and she can answer."

Tilda sprang up and walked into the open, with the men shouting for her to stay hidden.

"Show yourself, Harvey Oakes!" she called. "What's the deal?"

THERE was a moment of waiting, then Oakes stepped out from behind a rocky ledge.

"I'll get backing from the county seat bank and buy you out. I always wanted the Box D to add to my ranch. We don't want any women ranch owners hereabouts. You'll get a fair price."

"That's enough!" Tilda called. "The Box D isn't for sale, Oakes. If it was, I'd sell to anybody else before you. My dad built up this outfit, and left it to me. It's a heritage to be guarded. Now I'll offer a deal."

"I'm listenin'," Oakes called.

"Call off your men and send them home. We'll fix the fence again. You'll pay for the work and material, and for the cattle you've killed. And you won't make another bad move against the Box D. Agreed to that, and do it, and we'll forget all this."

"If I don't?"

"Then I reckon we'll end the ruckus right here and now, Oakes."

Oakes gave a yell and darted behind the rock. His waiting men came charging out, their horses rested. So it had been a trick, after all.

Guns began cracking again. Two more X Dash saddles were emptied. Some of the X Dash men had enough, and rushed for cover, then began to retreat. Perhaps getting killed for Harvey Oakes did not appeal to them.

But some of them, with Oakes urging, came charging on. There was a wild patter of hoofbeats as Chet Burke suddenly dashed from cover and rode madly to where Tilda was crouched behind the rock. Billy Huston began firing to cover Chet's dash.

But Billy dropped his gun, groaned, and fell back.

"Billy!" Tilda cried.

"It's—all right—only in the shoulder," he said.

Chet dropped out of saddle, holding his rifle, and clawing at his six-gun to get it out of its holster. This would be close work, six-gun work. The other men were yelling and shooting. Oakes and three men still came on.

One of the three stopped his horse, dropped his rifle and clung to the saddlehorn, badly wounded.

"Stop shooting, or I'll shoot Tilda Dorson," Oakes was shouting at the Box D men.

He came charging on as another of his men stopped his horse and held up his hands.

"Chet!" Oakes screeched. "Chet Burke! You're my nephew! Grab that Dorson girl and hold on to her! We'll make her talk turkey!"

Tilda looked straight at him.

"It's your chance, Chet," she said. "He'd probably make you his heir."

Oakes rode around the rock at that instant—and Chet carefully shot him in the left shoulder and knocked him out of his saddle. Jumping forward Chet stood over him, gun held ready.

His eyes were blazing.

"I told you, when we talked down by the creek, that I wasn't your kind," Chet said. "You almost let my mother and me starve, and her your own sister. I'm ready to testify against you when this matter comes up for trial."

The firing had stopped entirely now. The wounded men of the X Dash outfit had crawled to cover, and the others had gone back through the fence and ridden over the hill toward Oakes' ranchhouse.

But hoofbeats came from another direction, and down upon the scene came the sheriff with a posse. He pulled up within a short distance of Tilda and the others, and his men began scattering to look over the battlefield.

"Sheriff!" Oakes called. "I'm making a complaint. The Box D men cut their own wire and let their cattle through, then accused me of having it done. They began firing at us!"

"Save your breath, you being wounded," the grizzled, stern sheriff snapped at him. "One of your men got drunk in Sandy Bend last night and told about your plans. That's how I happen to be here. And I saw most of this ruckus while we were riding down the slope. You started the charge and fighting, Oakes, and the Box D people were only defending themselves. I've warned you enough about having trouble on this range."

"I'd get away from it fast enough if I could find a buyer," Oakes said.

Chet walked over to him. "In that case, I'll buy you out," he said.

"You!" Tilda cried.

"Sure. There's something this uncle of mine don't know. When my pa died, he left a lot of mining stock everybody thought was worthless. About a year ago, they struck a new vein. I sold that stock for plenty—too late to give my mother the easy life she deserved. I can buy the X Dash for cash and have plenty left over."

"All right!" the sheriff snapped. "Nobody's been killed, and only two Box D men hurt, and not bad. Four X Dash men hurt, one bad, and serves 'em right. Sell pronto, Oakes, and we'll let you get out of the country. Refuse, and you're startin' on the road to prison soon as we can wrap up your busted shoulder."

"I—I'll sell," Oakes muttered. "Be glad to."

"Good. Maybe we can have a decent range here, then."

CHET walked away to catch up his pony, and suddenly Tilda was beside him, going to get her own.

"Chet, you really mean it?" she asked. "You'll buy him out?"

"Meant every word of it."

"And when it came to the show-down, you—you stood by me, Chet."

"Why, sure!"

"If you buy the X Dash, we—we'll be close neighbors."

He looked at her, and smiled. "Neighbors? Is that any kind of talk? I've got some ideas about X Dash ranch."

"What ideas, Chet?"

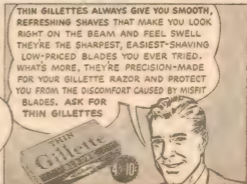

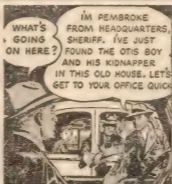

"Well, you take the X Dash and combine it with the Box D, and you've got the greatest outfit in this part of the state. We could tear down that fence and not fuss about water or anything. That is, if you'll marry me."

His voice had grown softer as he looked down at her. And he read her answer in the expression of her face. Regardless of those who might be watching, he clasped her in his arms and gave Tilda the kiss for which she had been hungering.

"You did it," she said, her voice muffled against his shoulder. "You tamed me."

"But I don't want you tame," Chet protested. "I want you wild—wild in love with me."

Trail Leads To Haunted House And Then . .

As the blond girl's glance rested on Jake, for the first time in Alva's life she knew swift, disturbing envy

*A Complete
Novelet*

It Has to Be

By RUTH ANDERSON

Alva Roberts of the Flying T faces a bewildering range problem when both she and her neighbor Jake Brandon want some Big Horn grassland—and the resulting strife almost breaks her heart!

CHAPTER I

A Gray-Eyed Man—and a Blonde

ALVA ROBERTS, on a restless-eyed paint pony, watched the last of the stock being herded into the cattle cars. And as the door slammed shut her shoulders sagged in utter weariness.

She had left the Flying T long before dawn to take part in the drive into Rawlins, in spite of the foreman's protest that he and six waddies were more than enough to handle the cattle. The Flying T was her job and during the three years since her father's death she had kept it running with smooth efficiency.

Now this particular task was done, and the weariness did not matter. She nodded at Ed Higgins, the foreman, but smiling required an effort, for the muscles of her face felt stiff. She moistened her lips and, with the taste of dust in her mouth, wheeled her pony.

Almost before she saw the man at the end of the shed, her glance was caught up into his eyes. Cool, pleasant gray eyes which made her think of shade against fierce heat. His dark grave face reminded her of someone, something.

She tried to recall what it was, but the sunlight was playing tricks by turning into flashing knives which stabbed at her eyes. The reins were sliding from her hands and as her fingers tightened, she pitched out of saddle.

She dropped into thick, swirling mists and when the mists lifted she saw the same grave face and steady, cool eyes.

"It's all right," the gray-eyed man said. "Feeling better?"

Her glance dropped to his and she liked the faint upward curve at the corners of his lips. She liked his chin, too, and decided it was pleasant to study his face like this without bothering about who he was or why he was so close to her. Pleasant and restful.

"How do you feel?" he repeated.

"All right."

"Try sitting up, ma'am."

Her glance left him and, as she took in the scene around her, she jerked erect. She was on a narrow bench in the waiting room of the railroad station and the stranger's arm was around her, supporting her. His touch had made her feel oddly secure.

"What happened?" she demanded.

"You fainted, ma'am."

"Fainted?" Her blue eyes showed disbelief. "I couldn't have! I never faint."

SHE forgot his arms and the unreal seconds for which she had studied his face. She was once more Alva Roberts who was capable of managing the largest ranch in the Big Horn country and could work side by side with any man in her outfit.

"Maybe you didn't faint," he murmured. "Maybe you just got a little sleepy."

Her cheeks warmed. "It might have been the sun," she said, her words clipped. "That could happen to anyone."

"Sure."

There was a drawl in his voice, but his glance was pleasantly friendly. Restful as the touch of a cool hand.

She curved her lips into a careful, just sufficiently cordial smile because she wanted to hide a new, sudden uneasiness.

"Thank you for helping me," she said. "I'm Alva Roberts."

He took her hand, without hurry, and again the faint sense of alarm flashed through her. Deliberately she let her glance run over him and saw that in spite of his smile, the gravity was still on his face. Dressed in faded range clothes, he looked rawhide-lean and there were lines at the sides of his mouth.

"I know," he said. "You own the Flying T. I'm Jake Brandon of the Boxed O, which makes me a neighbor of yours—in a distant sort of way."

"You ought to rest, ma'am," her foreman cut in. "How about going to the hotel for a few hours?"

"That's a good idea," Brandon said, before Alva could speak. "I'll drive you there."

"I'm looking after Miss Roberts," Higgins voice was edged.

But Jake Brandon's eyes drew Alva's glance in their far gray depths. And the uneasiness once more edged through her.

"Thank you," she said to Jake, forgetting that Higgins was waiting for an answer. "That'll give us a chance to talk. Neighbors ought to know each other."

"There's a rent buckboard waiting outside," he told her. "Ready to leave?"

"Ma'am,"—the foreman's words thrust between them—"I'd rather go with you, so I can be sure you're all right."

"I will be." She spoke in her usual, even tones. "You can come to the hotel later, but not until sundown. I want to sleep."

The words were entirely courteous, but they also held a note of accepted authority. She was the boss, issuing orders.

The corners of Brandon's mouth moved and light flickered in his eyes. He took Alva's arm and as they left the waiting room she wondered if she was moving with deliberate slowness in order to prolong the seconds of the nearness, the awareness of his touch. During the first moment of consciousness after her faint, his closeness had given her a feeling of security.

"But that's crazy," she told herself. "I'm probably still weak, and imagining things."

As they emerged from the station, a pony traveling at top speed shot around the corner of the building and slid to a stop.

"Jake!" the girl in the saddle cried. "You're back! Welcome home!"

Her glance brushed fleetingly over Alva and hurried back to Brandon. And, for the first time in her life, Alva knew swift, disturbing envy. The girl was a wheat-colored blonde with a perfect skin, and her hazel eyes were startling against such fairness. She was immaculately smart in whipcord riding pants, polished boots, white silk shirt and emerald neckerchief. Her hair gleamed and her skin glowed.

By contrast Alva thought she herself must look like a drab in her practical outfit of gray flannel shirt, gray breeches and old boots, all generously covered with dust.

"Hi, Bess!" Brandon greeted. "This is Alva Roberts—maybe you know each other."

The blond girl nodded. "Yes, years ago, in the county grade school," she said unsmilingly.

Alva's eyes widened in surprise and she searched hastily through her memory for a child resembling this lovely blonde.

Bess smiled, thinly. "You wouldn't remember, of course. I'm Bess White. I live on the Crossed Y, near the river branch. The White place."

"Oh—yes," Alva flushed.

The Crossed Y was a small unprosperous ranch which had once lost a war rights suit against the Flying T. A place of sagging outbuildings, and a dilapidated house crowded with unkempt children.

"It's strange we haven't seen each other in so long," Alva said. "But I'm glad we've finally met again."

"No, its not strange." Bess White's voice was colorless. "After we finished the eighth grade you went East to school. Besides, I don't see much of—the Flying T people."

"I'm taking Miss Roberts to the hotel, Bess," Jake Brandon said quickly. "It was good to see you again."

The fair girl's face went still. "But won't we meet later on? You've just come back—and you've been away for ages!"

He grinned up at her. "Not as long as that, but I like the way it sounds. I'll be around town for the rest of the day. We can't miss each other."

The stillness remained on Bess' face as she lifted the reins.

"Adios. Good-by—Alva."

AS BESS rode away, Brandon's glance followed her. When his eyes again met Alva's, they had changed, become guarded.

Jake Brandon helped Alva into the rent buckboard, took a place beside her on the rear seat, and as it rolled away from the station, she felt suddenly, sharply alone. Or as if Bess White were still present!

"Tell me about your ranch," she said.

His gray glance reached for hers and she wondered if he was thinking of the other girl.

"What am I worrying about?" she asked herself, impatiently. "It doesn't matter who he's thinking of! Once I've had a rest this'll seem—funny. I may not even remember him, for I know a lot of men, most of them better looking, but when they go romantic on me, I'm always sorry. Yet here I am, behaving as if this is terribly important!"

"The Boxed O's a small spread," Jake told her. "Only three waddies in my outfit, but I'm beginning to build up the herd and I'll have to expand soon. We drove the beef crop to the pens, so I've been away. I'd just got off the train when I noticed your cattle being loaded, and stopped to have a look. Not many ranchers around here can afford to ship by rail."

Alva straightened and the new, awkward uncertainty left her.

"In the end it's cheaper," she explained briskly. "Because the stock reaches the feeding pens more quickly and without as much loss of weight. That means a shorter time in the pens and more profit on the market."

There was a brief, puzzling flicker of light in his gray eyes.

"Sure," he drawled, "but it also depends on your financing or bank-roll. Not everybody has enough cash to take the long view."

"But—"

"Here's the hotel, ma'am."

He went in with her and waited while she registered.

"You'll be all right now," he said, as a bellboy came to show her upstairs. "Adios, ma'am."

"Wait!" The word lifted too sharply. "Won't I—we'll meet again, won't we?"

Was she actually doing this? Insisting upon seeing him? Bess White had made the same demand, but with a difference. Bess had been as feminine and intriguing as a chiffon scarf, whereas she, Alva, was anything but that at the moment! Odd, though, that the blond girl had been so smartly and expensively dressed, considering the probable income of the Crossed Y.

Brandon had turned back and there was the brief, far flicker of light in his eyes.

"I hope so," he said. Then, almost awkwardly, as if he too, were suddenly unsure, he put out his hand. "How about dinner? Or aren't you staying in town overnight?"

The pressure of his fingers was a steady warmth and she forgot Bess White.

"Yes, dinner'll be nice."

Remembering she had intended to leave for the Flying T before dark, she turned away too swiftly and was nervously careful not to glance back as she went upstairs. Her throat was on fire and thin jets of flame were climbing into her cheeks.

This was ridiculous! She was behaving as girls had during her grandmother's youth.

The big room into which the bellboy showed her seemed filled with mirrors, although later she realized that actually it contained only three. And when she dropped into a chair, she faced a shocking reflection. Her dark hair, which usually held blue shadows in its soft waves, was gray with dust. Her face was dirty, her eyes looked strained and her riding clothes might have just emerged from a sandstorm.

"No wonder he was anxious to get away," she thought, and went to ring a bell which, according to the notice above it, would bring the hall maid.

With the maid's help, she shampooed her hair and got into a tin tub filled with hot water so that, wrapped in a sheet-sized bath towel, she was finally able to face the mirrors with more composure.

TALLER than the average girl, Alva's body was fashioned with a nice balance which made her seem almost small. Her hair, once more glisteningly dark, emphasized the blue of her eyes, and her lips were the deep, lush crimson which belongs only with black hair.

"Maybe he won't recognize me when I'm clean," she decided and, turning away from the mirror, got into bed.

She was asleep immediately, and was awakened at dusk by the sound of her name spoken in a voice which touched the words with music. Gathering the sheet hastily around her bare shoulders, she started up in panic. But the room was empty except for herself, and after a moment she grinned.

"I actually thought I'd heard him. That's what is known as a vivid dream."

The grin disappeared abruptly. She had heard him saying her name. Had dreamed of Jake Brandon's voice touching it with special meaning.

Getting out of bed she dressed and went to the window which looked out toward the distant Big Horns. As her unseeing glance fixed on the peaks, she told herself:

"I can't pretend. Things like this do happen, after all—and this is it. He's the one—Jake Brandon."

Well, there was a way to manage anything. She had learned that during the three years since her father's death, and knew that the first was to come to a definite decision. If she wanted Brandon, if she really loved him, the problem was simple. Most men found her attractive and it shouldn't be hard to interest him.

Nor need marriage change her life. He had said his Boxed O was a small spread, which meant they could get rid of it and make the Flying T their home.

"Yes, it would be all right," she concluded. "If he's the one, I'll marry him."

CHAPTER II

Anger in His Kiss?

WITH a final glance at her crumpled riding clothes, Alva went downstairs to the lobby and sat in a chair near the staircase. Straight ahead was the hotel entrance and directly across from her, through an arched doorway was the writing room.

A man and girl were in the writing room, sitting close together and talking in low voices. Alva looked away, but the girl's suddenly lifting voice pulled her glance back.

"I don't care what you say!" the girl cried. "The Flying T will grab—as it always has. She's like her father!"

The angry words were choked off, and Alva saw that the girl was Bess White. And the man Jake Brandon. Bess shot up from her chair, then turned and spoke again, in tones which were almost inaudible. But as Jake got to his feet, Bess laughed and swayed toward him, her face lifting.

Brandon bent and kissed her. And thin, hard laughter formed inside of Alva.

This was the man she had decided to marry because "it had to be!"

Jake was grinning as the kiss ended, and he and Bess started out of the writing room. They passed within a few feet of Alva and walked toward the main doors. Alva stared after them.

"They were too interested in each other to see me or anyone else," she thought.

She locked her hands together in her lap and looked down at them. If that was the situation she was lucky to know it so quickly. Now she could keep the thing which had sprung into life at her first meeting with Jake Brandon from growing. Could push it farther and farther away, until it no longer touched her.

"Miss Roberts!"

She felt her heart jerk and realized Brandon was standing before her, his gray eyes cool, the lines at the sides of his mouth lost in his smile.

"I came down here to wait for you, hoping it'd be cooler," she said.

"I've heard it's almost breezy in the dining room," he told her. "Let's find out."

"Don't tell me that I heard music," she said, as they started for the dining room. "Rawlins is becoming very grand."

"Yeah. Bess says this hotel has dinner music every night, and a dance once a week."

Alva's teeth clicked together behind her lips. She had so quickly forgotten Bess whom she had seen in his arms. She must remember that being with Jake was a casual matter, brought about by her own insistence; by his desire to be courteous.

The waiter settled them at a table well away from the orchestra and placed to catch the breeze from the long windows opening onto an outside gallery.

"It's nice being with you," Brandon said. "The owner of the Flying T always gets the best. I'd have been stuck in a corner."

"I don't believe that. If you've been here before—" But she cut off her words and color stung into her cheeks.

"Yes, I've been here," he said, "but with Bess White and they give her the best, too. Pretty girls like Bess always get special attention."

"She's very lovely," Alva said evenly.

"Almost as lovely as you." The crooked curve of his mouth deepened and he added, "Why look surprised? You know you're prettier than Bess—in a different way. But Bess makes every man feel she needs his protection."

Alva's blue eyes looked directly into his.

"And with me," she said, "they wonder what kind of a deal they can get out of the Flying T."

Light ran along his gray glance. "Guess you've called the turn."

"Thanks." She finished her coffee and put down the cup. "I've a definite feeling, Jake Brandon, that you don't like me. So let's go."

But as they left the table, he drew her arm through his and his grin was a hand closing on her heart.

"How about a walk on the gallery, just to prove we're still friends?" he asked.

The gallery was actually a narrow, roofed porch which encircled the building and just now it was mysterious with a mist of mingled moonlight and darkness.

They walked silently toward the front of the hotel, but there Brandon stopped.

"You're not entirely right," he said abruptly, and his hands, closing on her shoulders, turned her around to face him. "What I didn't explain is that Bess' type is more appealing at the moment, because a man knows that eventually she can be labeled 'finished business' and he can get on with the job of living."

"The words sound all right but they don't mean anything," Alva said, and she could feel his glance, a line of flame, moving over her face.

"I'm saying that some women are easy to love because a man's instinct tells him it won't be fatal one way or another. But a girl like you is something else. He'll never get you out of his system, even by marrying you."

"Very nice. Just the right way to—soften what you said in the dining room."

"I'm not trying to soften anything. I'm just being honest." His grip on her shoulders had tightened and her flesh under his fingers stirred into fire.

And then she was in his arms, held tightly against him. His lips, claiming hers, brought back the moment of their first meeting, pushed away the thought of Bess and the realization that he cared for her. Flame was in his kiss, blazing against Alva's lips.

But there was also something else. Something like angry denial.

The mist of moonlight and darkness was closing in, holding them together and her lips were answering his. And she knew again that it had to be. That he was the one man, and that nothing could make her put him out of her life.

Not even Bess, for he might have been mistaken in thinking he cared for the other girl. He might have accepted something less than love, because his love belonged to her, Alva. She would be a weakling to give him up without a fight—and she wouldn't! Not until he proved he belonged to Bess White.

He released her, slowly, and they looked at each other without speaking. Was there actual anger in his eyes? Were his lips which had taken hers so demandingly, twisted into harshness?

"Maybe that'll give you an idea," he said.

"Yes." Her lips were unsteady. "It may even tell me—"

But she stopped, realizing she had almost admitted her own emotion. Had determined to force Bess out of his life so that it could belong to Alva Roberts.

His gray glance thinned, but abruptly he grinned.

"You're a strange girl. You don't seem to know anything of life or men. You act as if you'd never learned to laugh, or flirt."

Shock ran up into her throat and stopped her breath. She had never learned to laugh or flirt. So that's how it was, how he felt. His kiss had been part of a game, perhaps one he frequently played!

Her head lifted, her eyes began mocking.

"Maybe my game is a little smoother than yours," she challenged.

He was still very close, almost touching her, but she would not betray her awareness of him by moving away.

"I should have thought of that," he murmured. "Smoothness usually comes from practice, doesn't it?"

"So I've been told."

He kissed her again but there was no laughter, no flirtatious lightness in the kiss. Instead, his lips forced an answer from hers and she clung to him, yielding to his arms.

"Yes, it has to be," she was thinking. 'Even if he pretends it's a game. Even if it is one for him.'

But it was she who moved away, drawing back, out of his arms.

"I just remembered," she said, trying to make her breathless words sound casual. "I can't stay in town, after all. My foreman's coming at ten to drive me out to the Flying T. One of the waddies has already taken our horses to the ranch. . . ."

At sunup, Alva awoke with a sense of urgency, a hurried need to remember something, someone. And the memory came at once. Jake Brandon.

She got out of bed swiftly, holding away the thought of him, and after a hurried bath dressed in another of her practical riding costumes. Tying a scarlet neckerchief at the throat of her brown shirt, she went downstairs.

Kate Nesbit, her housekeeper, served breakfast. As they ate, the older woman made notes on supplies and menus.

The day was moving into its customary routine.

But as Alva left the table, Mrs. Nesbit said abruptly:

"Are you worried about anything?"

"No. Why do you ask?"

"You seem different."

Warmth beat up into the girl's cheeks. "I don't feel different," she assured.

SUNLIGHT was bright and hard when she stepped from the low porch which ran the entire length of the big, oblong-shaped ranchhouse. Her father had had the house remodeled just before his death, and it was imposing in its simplicity.

Of adobe-covered brick, it had been planned to allow a maximum of light and air while retaining the characteristics of the Wyoming range. Surrounded by a lawn, kept green with water piped down from the hills, it was separated from the working yard which contained bunkhouse, corrals, barns and cookshack.

The foreman came out of his office in the bunkhouse.

"I was just going up to the house," he said, baring his sparse gray hair to the sunlight. "Been wondering how to begin what I have to tell you. You're not going to like it."

She waited, without speaking and he went on:

"After you went to the hotel yesterday, I ran into Dirk Belding. Probably should have told you last night, but it was late and you'd fainted at the loading pens, so I waited."

"Who's Dirk Belding?" she asked.

Higgins' glance shifted. "That land agent who came up here from Denver last year. I thought you'd heard about him. Before anyone knew what was going on, he'd bought up every unclaimed piece of grassland in the county. Some of it was range which should've belonged to different ranches, but didn't legally, because mistakes were made when the spreads were surveyed. Anyhow, he's got it—and all according to law."

"Yes," Alva said. "The bank manager mentioned it weeks ago, and I didn't like the way it sounded. This man Belding doesn't seem too honest."

Higgins shrugged. "It's honest enough—as some business methods go. But it means there's no more open range and the southeast section of the home spread now belongs to Belding."

"The land near Green Creek branch?" she exclaimed. "Why, that's always belonged to the Flying T!"

"No, ma'am. We thought it did, but he proved to the county land office by maps and surveyors that it's beyond the Flying T line, not included in the title record of the land."

"I see. I suppose he wants us to buy it back. Is that it?"

"Not exactly. He intends to sell it to the highest bidder. There are several bidders, he tells me, and one of 'em was trying to close the deal yesterday."

"Who?"

"Jake Brandon of the Boxed O. Seems he's enlarging his outfit. I told Belding I'd take it range. Even if it costs a thousand dollars to hold onto it until you can buy it, the Flying T's better off. The grassland'll mean a lot more than a thousand dollars."

Her determined control broke.

"But there's the little matter of how I might feel!" she snapped. "Don't you think I ought to be consulted before you start anything like this? I've never given you such authority, Ed."

"I know, but Belding said he wouldn't wait for any woman to make up her mind. He wanted the decision then."

She flushed. "You were sure I'd back you up? Make good on a deal I knew nothing about."

"Yes, ma'am." He looked at her steadily. "I figured you'd trust my judgment the same as your dad did."

Next Issue: THE MONTANA KNIGHT, Novelet by SHIRLEY MANNERS

up with you this morning, but he wouldn't wait. Said Brandon's offer was a good one and he wanted a decision right then, before sundown. Finally I worked out a deal. Maybe I overstepped myself, but it seemed the best thing to do. I took an option in your name."

She turned her head, sharply. "How much did you say I'd pay for the option and how long does it run?"

"A thousand dollars. It has to be taken up in two weeks."

"A thousand dollars!" Her lashes squeezed together until her eyes were thin lines of dark blue. "Does it apply on the purchase price, and what is he asking for the section?"

Higgins' usually florid face looked colorless. "The thousand is for the right to buy at the end of two weeks. He hasn't definitely fixed the price. He's going to take written bids and accept the highest offer. The value of the option is that after bids are in you'll have a chance to meet the top price."

She was silent, her eyes as cold as blue tile. Anger was robbing her lips of fullness, but when she spoke, her voice was careful, though Ed Higgins had always been with the Flying T. Or at least, had been top-hand for as long as she could remember.

"You've certainly—surprised me," she said. "And Dad wouldn't have believed this. He always said you were the best rancher in the country."

The foreman's jaw set. "We need that

Alva turned sharply away, but stopped and came back to him.

"Of course I'll go through with it. How does he want the money?"

"I told him your check would be mailed today."

"All right. Ask the wrangler to get my pony."

The incident was closed, but Alva was still angry and when her horse was ready she rode swiftly out of the yard. But on the wagon trail she reined in.

"I'd better see Jake Brandon," she thought. "I don't like our being made to bid against each other. And it's foolish. The section's always belonged to the Flying T."

Wheeling south, she rode toward Green River Branch and, beyond the forks, passed the Crossed Y, Bess White's home. Automatically she slowed her mount to look at the small spread with its unpainted gate posts sunk in weeds. It was hard to visualize smart, pretty Bess living in such a place.

At the southeast section she left the trail and took to the range. Riding through grazing Flying T cattle, she headed for the Boxed O, a mile east.

The ranch bore the orderly stamp a competent cattleman always gives his land. The gates were neatly lettered, the buildings freshly painted. At one end of the yard was a small log and 'dobe house. At the other, a bunkhouse and barn. There was just one person in sight, a man working in the corral.

CHAPTER III

Unexpected Visitor

ALVA'S pulse lifted and struck against the flesh of her wrists, and at the sound of her pony's hoofs, Jake Brandon turned. He waved and came out to meet her.

"Howdy, ma'am," he greeted.

"Good morning," she said. "I thought we ought to have a talk."

He nodded, his eyes quiet and pleasantly cool.

"Good business men always like direct action. Let's go into the house."

"Good business men!" Last night he had told her his kiss had been only part of the man and woman game. A moment's flirtation and nothing more.

He helped her down, his touch impersonal as if she had never been in his arms or known the demand of his lips, and they walked to the house.

"My shack's just bachelor's quarters, ma'am," he said. "You'll probably think it more of a camp than a house."

But inside, she found complete cleanliness and comfort. There were no curtains, but the window panes were sparklingly clear. The living room held big chairs, tables piled with magazines, and newspapers, book-cases and foot-rests.

"You don't seem to be suffering actual hardship," she murmured.

"Not too much."

He pulled out a chair and when she sat down, he began to roll a smoke.

"There was something you wanted to talk about," he reminded her.

Streaks of color shot across her cheeks and disappeared into the hair above her temples.

"Yes. A lot of things," she said, her voice light.

He met her glance. "But the real reason for your visit is the southeast section."

He was refusing to let the memory of the night before come between them. Was being deliberately remote.

"Yes," she said, matching his tone. "I didn't know that it wasn't part of the Flying T until my foreman told me Belding had bought it, as he's bought a lot of other land in this district. So I—we've taken an option on it."

"Yeah. An option to pay anything Belding asks. It's nice to be rich."

She got out of her chair. "I'm sorry you feel that way. I came here because I wanted to be frank about it. I don't like secret maneuvering or—tricks."

"Sure." He came slowly to his feet and seemed very tall as he looked down at her. "And by explaining I haven't a chance, you may get it cheaper, with no one bidding against you."

Her eyes opened to wideness and the hot color dropped out of her face. His face was closed against her and he was looking at her almost mockingly, while even now she wanted to reach out and touch him, to call back the seconds in his arms. Anger touched her, and leaped into sudden, violent storm.

"What's wrong with that?" she demanded. "You haven't a chance of outbidding me, and you know it."

Points of light showed in his eyes. "You're right, ma'am. But it's too bad you're not more of a woman and less of a business man. You're even pretty when you're mad."

She smiled thinly. "Isn't it? Good afternoon. I'll get my own pony—you needn't come with me."

His hand caught her wrist and he turned her around.

"At least, you can learn what being a woman's like," he said, and pulled her close to him.

As his head bent he paused, and his glance caught hers, held it for a second before he kissed her.

The fury dropped from her, and as her hands closed on his shoulders, tiny pulses beat in the tips of her fingers. Ragged little drums pounded in her wrists and throat. She had to make him understand, now, that she hadn't meant her angry challenge and didn't need to learn about being a woman.

His kiss changed and his lips became thin with the hardness of sudden denial, but she prolonged the kiss, her own lips reckless under his even while she knew he must be aware of her surrender.

But then they were standing apart looking at each other almost like enemies.

"Sorry, ma'am," he said, his tone matter-of-fact. "Your being a pretty girl hasn't anything to do with the southeast section, has it?"

She did not speak, and he moved past her to the door.

"I'll bring your horse," he said.

THE door closed behind him and she sank her teeth into her lower lip to hold back the tears. He didn't want her. He hadn't wanted her even when he kissed her, even when her lips had revealed her love.

Her hands closed and became fists.

"He thinks I'm unfeminine. He called me a 'business man' and maybe I do seem too capable. Men understand a girl like Bess—as if it isn't easy to be like her! As if any woman couldn't be soft and—beckoning."

But what if he really cared for the other girl?

Hoofs slapped across the yard and she went out, managing to smile as she said "Thanks."

He gave her a hand into the saddle.

"Come again, ma'am. You're always welcome on the Boxed O. . . ."

Alva and Kate Nesbit, the housekeeper, were having supper when Ed Higgins strode into the dining room.

"There's a man from the sheriff's office down at the bunkhouse," he said. "Young Bill Allen's in jail and Sheriff Lowe wants to know if you'll put up bail."

"Bill Allen?"

"One of our waddies. I hired him about six months ago. This is pay-day and when he went to town he got into a fracas with an hombre from the Boxed O. Both of 'em threw lead, but nobody's hurt. Allen's in jail for disturbing the peace."

Chill threaded along Alva's nerves. "Did it have anything to do with the southeast range?"

"I don't know, but I don't see why there'd be trouble over that. The whole thing's settled. The Flying T'll meet the highest bid and there's no reason for lead throwing. I'd better go to town and get Allen out."

"No." Alva pushed back her chair. "I'm going. Have a pony saddled while I change my clothes."

"This is nothing for you to get mixed up in," the foreman protested.

But Alva was already on her way upstairs.

Fifteen minutes later, she was riding toward Rawlins. The trip seemed longer than usual and even when she had reached the edge of the town she kept her pony at a fast canter. But nearing the busiest corner of the main street, she saw a buckboard flashing out of an intersecting road and wheeled her pony sharply to avoid a collision.

The buckboard raced past at unreduced speed and the street lights played over the driver and the girl at his side. The man was slight and fair, with a thin, shrewd face. The girl was Bess White.

When the buckboard disappeared, Alva rode on to the sheriff's office in front of the county jail. She was thinking that Bess had been looking up at the slight, fair man with unmistakable warmth, with invitation.

Jim Lowe, the sheriff, shot up from his desk when Alva entered.

"Miss Roberts! I didn't expect you. Evening, ma'am."

"One of your deputies told my foreman that a Flying T waddy's been arrested," she said. "I came to arrange bail."

The lawman looked surprised. "Yeah, I sent word out to Higgins—figured you wouldn't want a rider held in jail. But Jake Brandon bailed him out half an hour ago."

"Jake Brandon? You mean he put up bail? I thought Allen had fought one of his men."

"That's right, but still Jake got him out. Peculiar, maybe, but none of my business."

"I see." She turned away, but Lowe's voice stopped her.

"I'd figured on a little talk with Higgins, ma'am. Since you came, I'll have to tell you. There's a lot of gossip going around that the Flying T outfit's had orders to make it hot for the Boxed O—on account of the land both spreads want."

"That's not true!" Alva declared.

"Maybe not, ma'am, but I'm putting on extra deputies. The next hombre who throws lead in this town won't get bail. He'll stay here until he's tried."

Alva's lashes squeezed together and her glance held the sheriff's.

"You heard me say that the Flying T has had no such orders. Any waddy who starts trouble will answer to me for it. But I won't have my men blamed for quarrels they're prodded into. Good night."

She went out before he could reply and, stepping into saddle, started at top speed for the Flying T. When she entered the yard, Higgins was waiting for her.

"All right?" he demanded. "Did you get everything fixed?"

"I—" She started to explain, but changed her mind and dismounted. "I guess its all right," she said. "Good night, Ed."

"Where's Allen?" he asked.

SHE pretended not to hear and went on across the yard. The house looked serene in the moonlight and instead of entering the main hall, she turned down the porch to the long glass doors which served as living room windows. As she stepped through them, Jake Brandon got out of a chair.

"Good evening. I've been waiting for you."

"The sheriff said you put up bail for one of my waddies."

"Yeah."

The word was a low drawl, and his gray glance was light as silver. Metallic with anger! She went, her steps slow, to a chair.

"It seems strange," she said, choosing her words carefully. "Higgins told me Allen was arrested because of a fight with one of your men. Then why should you put up bail for him?"

"Let's sit down," he said. "This can be talked over between two sensible business men. We'll keep the practical angle in mind. You always do, don't you?"

She met the thin gaze. "No, not always." She spoke the words clearly and for a second, her blue eyes were pleading.

"Then I'm mistaken," he said. "Still, maybe we can get the story of Allen's arrest straightened out. Of course business men don't always settle their differences. Sometimes they just make their position clear."

She realized that her hair was wind-blown, her clothes ruffled, and that once more he was seeing her as disheveled and charmless.

"I'm waiting," she said. Her words were crisp but her pulses were hammers flailing at her wrists.

"That piece of grassland isn't worth a range war," he said. "But when I talked to Allen he felt he was expected to throw lead at anyone from the Boxed O."

"Why? What made him believe that?"

"He was hazy about it, but had an idea I'm trying to grab Flying T range. That's why I put up bail. He just wanted to be loyal to his boss. And killings are bad business, ma'am. So are fights between ranches. Expensive, too."

Alva's eyes strained against his and once more anger was touching her. And immediately it blazed into fierce, surging fury. He couldn't believe she was encouraging her outfit to start a range war! As if the Flying T would use guns to settle any issue! Yet, he was saying those things, telling her what she knew only too well!

She caught back the sweep of anger, told herself not to speak the furious words pressing against her lips.

"I agree with you," she said, and formed the words precisely. "It's very bad business, and the Flying T has never been accused of bad management."

The edged taunt could not be mistaken and she felt almost primitive satisfaction when a dark flush spread along his jaws.

"You're right, as usual," he said. "Goodnight, ma'am."

"I'll talk to Allen in the morning," Alva said, ignoring the fact that Jake was starting out of the room. "Maybe that'll clear things up."

He halted, turned back slowly and his smile was hard. "You won't have a chance to talk to him. He's not with your outfit any more. I hired him tonight and he's already on his way to my spread. He didn't have to return here to collect his wages, because this was pay-day."

"You hired him?"

"Yeah," Jake drawled. "I'm expanding—building up my herds—so I need more men."

"But why should he want to work for you?" Alva demanded. "The Flying T pays the highest salaries in the whole district."

"It did," Jake told her. "But this time I outbid you. I can play your game—for a little while."

"That's crazy. You can't outbid the Flying T!"

"I can try," he said, his words cutting through hers. "Goodnight, ma'am."

Again he started away, only to return to her.

"I forgot something—this seems to be a habit now."

And without taking her into his arms, he bent his head and kissed her. It was a swift, light kiss with nothing more than challenge behind it.

CHAPTER IV "It's All Over"

BY EIGHT o'clock the next morning Alva was at her desk in the office which had once belonged to her father, when Kate Nesbit came to the door.

"Bess White of the Crossed Y is here," Mrs. Nesbit said, her voice flat.

Alva started up, and then sat down again. Bess. Her hands fumbled at a drawer and when it opened she took out a mirror. She looked quite capable, as usual. Hair neatly smooth, clothes practical and unattractive.

She dropped the mirror back into the drawer and, leaving the office, crossed the hall to the living room.

Bess was waiting near the glass doors which formed the front wall, and Alva knew a second's sharp envy. The blond girl's clothing could not have been bought in Rawlins. Her tailored riding breeches were dark blue, her silk shirt a lighter tone of the same color and her neckerchief an even paler shade, all of which stressed the fairness of her lovely face. She was wearing boots of Spanish leather, and carrying a midnight blue Stetson.

"This is pretty early," she said at once, "but I couldn't wait to get it over. I haven't slept all night."

"Sit down, won't you?" asked Alva. "Would you like some breakfast?"

"No. I couldn't eat. Will you"—her hazel eyes fixed on Alva's—"try to understand what I'm going to say? Maybe I shouldn't have come here like this. Certainly I never thought I'd have to ask you for anything."

"If I can give you what you want, then its already yours."

Bess shook her head and dropped into a chair. "I wish it were that easy. I came about Jake Brandon, and the southeast section you both want."

"Oh. He told you."

"No. I heard it from someone—I've forgotten just who. But everyone on this range knows what's happening. And Jake's determined to have the land. When he found out Belding had given you an option he got reckless, crazy."

Alva did not speak, and the hazel glance swept sharply over her face.

"He persuaded the Diamond K and Circle C to go into partnership with him—he calls it a 'syndicate'—and the plan is for the three spreads to have joint use of the section. But the Diamond K and the Circle C are small outfits, too. They—he's had to borrow money. Jake is mortgaging his stock and everything he owns."

"Why?" asked Alva.

"To outbid you, of course! They'll make an offer you'll consider it foolish to meet. Jake"—she smiled apologetically, but with possessive tenderness—"says you're too good a business woman to pay ten times what the land's worth, that you'll let it go and find other range."

So he had talked to Bess. Had even discussed her, Alva, with the other girl.

"I'm not sure about that," Alva said. "The southeast section's necessary to the Flying T. Still, you came here thinking I could help you. What do you want me to do?"

Bess leaned forward in sudden, tense appeal.

"Don't let him have it! If he gets it by mortgaging his stock and isn't lucky, he'll lose everything. His ideas of enlarging his spread are wrong, anyhow. Things like that have to be done gradually. And if you just won't be outbid, he can't throw the Boxed O away on such a crazy gamble."

Alva wanted to close her eyes and shut out the sight of the other girl. She wanted, fiercely, to stop remembering Jake's arms and lips.

"It means a great deal to you, doesn't it?" she murmured.

"Yes," Bess said. "A girl doesn't fight to save a man from himself otherwise, does she?"

"Not usually."

"Then you'll see that he doesn't get the section?"

"I—"

But as Alva met Bess' eyes, her words stopped. For the smallest part of a second hard bits of light had glinted against the soft hazel.

"I don't know what to say, right now," Alva said then. "I'd like to think it over for a while."

Bess' lips drooped. "Well—thanks, anyhow."

"I'll let you know tomorrow," promised Alva.

She went to the door and watched the blond girl ride out of the yard.

"She's so feminine," she thought again. "So obviously feminine, and everything about her stresses it. Maybe Jake Brandon can't help loving her. If I'd been more like Bess when I first met Jake, if I'd been wearing the right clothes, it might have been different."

SHE broke off, her eyes fixing into an unseeing stare. And then she whirled for the stairs. Maybe Jake wasn't yet actually in love with Bess, even though the girl had come here to help him, and in that case, there was still a chance. Alva Roberts had a right to fight for him.

Taking the stairs at a run, she crossed her bedroom to the big, well-fitted closet which was filled with lovely clothes. Exquisite dresses, shoes and hats, which were shipped regularly from New York. Only her riding costumes had been kept drably "suitable" to the job of running a ranch.

Pulling out half a dozen dresses, she spread them on the bed, placed sheer underwear and gossamer stockings beside them. And after that she went to work.

It was noon when she got into the buckboard waiting before the door. The whole morning had gone into the business of dressing, but she had achieved her objective. A dressmaker suit of dusty rose defined her firmly straight body and small waist. Her hat was also of dusty rose in a wide, pliant straw which made a perfect background for her skin and eyes. Her hair, curling away from her cheeks, was night mist rolled into neatness at the nape of her neck. Black gloves, slippers, and bag lent exactly the right accent.

Belding's office was on the second floor of the bank building and, leaving the buckboard near the hitch-rack, she went up the stairs, telling herself that the meeting with the land operator would be a bet. An answer to her attractiveness which would help her to make Jake Brandon realize her femininity.

On the second floor, she saw the name "Dirk Belding" in huge letters and, as she turned toward it, the door opened. Bess White came out and behind Bess was a Flying T waddy named "Red" Taylor.

Bess stopped sharply, and her hazel eyes were startled. She spoke so quickly that her lips had no shape.

"Alva! You're here, too! When I saw you I didn't expect to go to town. I—" Her words trailed off in confusion.

"I thought I'd better have a talk with Mr. Belding," Alva explained, and let her glance rest on Red Taylor.

He flushed, and jerked off his hat.

"Afternoon ma'am," he muttered.

"Of course," Bess said. "Well, of course. See you later."

She hurried for the stairs and Taylor followed swiftly, as if anxious to escape.

Alva pushed open the door they had just closed and entered a big, bare-looking office. At a desk near the windows was the fair, shrewd-looking man she had seen with Bess

White the night before. He got up, his smile so wide as to seem intense.

"Can I help you, Miss—" His teeth were unusually fine and the smile showed all of them.

"Are you Mr. Belding?" Alva asked.

"Yes." His eyes took on the intensity of his mouth, and signaled admiration.

"I'm Alva Roberts." She took the seat he placed beside the chair, and her smile was uncertain, her blue glance hopeful. "I came about the rangeland. That section—you know? Its always been part of the Flying T, or so we thought. But now my foreman tells me it belongs to you."

Surprise glinted briefly in his eyes and she wondered if he ever stopped smiling, or if it were a form of nervous affliction.

But he leaned toward her and beamed even more determinedly.

"Your foreman took an option in your name," he said. "I got your check this morning."

She nodded as if relieved that he understood.

"He told me to send it right away. I depend on him so much. I don't know what I'd have done without him since Dad died—" She let her voice trail off into wistfulness, then went on: "I came to ask if we couldn't just settle things without so much trouble. If other people also want to buy the land, it's liable to—well, I don't want my neighbors to think I'm selfish. Couldn't I just pay you whatever you want for the section right now?"

Her own smile was almost shy, as she waited. It even faded under his unwavering white-toothed grin. And his eyes told her she was lovely, the kind of girl men wanted to do things for.

He edged his chair closer to hers. "There's nothing for you to worry about, Miss Roberts. Forget the whole thing until its time to take up the option. After everyone's made their bid you can meet the highest, and the land is yours."

"Then I can't just pay whatever you want right now?"

The admiration in his eyes brightened as he shook his head.

"Sorry," he said with another smile, "it can't be done that way."

ALVA felt silent laughter roll up in her. He was fervently acknowledging feminine beauty and appeal, but was making it clear such things had nothing to do with business or profit!

"But the Boxed O can't afford to pay what I will," she said guilelessly.

"I'm not sure. Brandon was here an hour or two ago and he's ready to go pretty high."

Alva accepted defeat then, and left, smiling her thanks for Belding's farewell compliments. If Jake had been here an hour before, he might still be in town, and if they were to meet he would see her as she was now—as she could always be for him.

She walked slowly up the main street and at the end of the business section, crossed to the opposite sidewalk for the return trip. And, glancing through the uncurtained windows of the town's one restaurant, she saw him sitting at a table.

Automatically, without willing it, she turned into the café. Bright patches of color burned against her cheek-bones and as a waitress led her toward a table, Brandon glanced up.

"Miss Roberts," he said, pushing back his chair. But he was cool. "How about sitting with me? I've just ordered."

"Thank you." Her eyes were deep and her mouth soft as she looked up at him.

As soon as the waitress had taken her order and left, he asked:

"How'd you get along with Belding?"

Her lips broke apart and the patches of color in her cheeks spread out over her face. But before she could speak, he added:

"That's about the only reason you'd be in town again today."

She fixed her glance on the table. There was no difference in his voice, no change in his eyes as he looked at her. Couldn't he see she was no longer the "business woman" but a decorative girl?

"I was hoping to get the thing settled right away," she said, "so we could stop being—competitors." She saw the lines cut into the flesh between his brows and added, hastily: "There's no reason for us to fight each other. I'd like to be friends—real neighbors."

"Meaning," he said, "that you don't like opposition. Because I hired Allen away from the Flying T, you're even more determined to keep the southeast section. But I'm afraid you've got a fight on your hands. A couple of other ranchers are coming in with me, and we'll make it bad business."

The warmth in her cheeks disappeared and her lips drooped. He was talking exactly as if she were a tired, disheveled girl in unattractive riding clothes. And he was unconscious of any difference in her appearance or manner.

Her slim shoulders sagged and a new, heavy stillness gathered inside of her. It was no good. Apparently Bess had blinded him to every other woman in the world.

"Why not be honest?" she asked herself. "The truth probably is that he loves Bess. Maybe he loves her so much no one else means anything."

She lifted her chin and smiled. "You sound as if you hate me," she said.

His gaze remained level and quiet. "I wouldn't say that. Maybe I just understand you."

"I don't believe I'll wait for lunch, after all. Adios."

Without hearing his reply, she went out and walked back to the buckboard. It was over, and she could go on with her job of running the Flying T. That is, as soon as she stopped feeling empty inside.

Alva flicked the whip above the horse's back and the buckboard picked up speed. A breeze touched her face and she pulled off the big, dusty-rose hat and dropped it onto the seat. The Green River Branch and the forks were just ahead. She turned the horse onto the road-trail, leading west and then jerked at the reins, pulling to a stop.

That had sounded like a gun! And it had come from the east!

The hoarse, metallic bark came again and chill flickered along Alva's nerves. She backed the buckboard, wheeled swiftly and cracked the whip, sending the horse racing across the main road, toward the southeast section. As she passed the Crossed Y she did not even glance toward the gates, and as her swaying vehicle neared the section, she used the whip again.

There was a blurred scene at first. Cattle milling nervously. But then she saw a riderless pony and a man kneeling beside a still figure whose arms were stretched out against the earth.

SENDING the buckboard off the trail, onto the range, Alva drove it through the scattering cattle, not even aware of its dangerous swaying. The kneeling man looked up, stared, and got to his feet. She wrapped the reins around the whipstock and jumped to the ground, forgetting her high-heeled slippers as she tried to run.

"What is it? What's happened?"

The man was a Flying T rider named Hank Murphy, and he stared at her oddly.

"You can see for yourself, ma'am. That's one of Brandon's waddies. He's been shot here on our range—or what we call our range."

His tone was harsh and the chill deepened around Alva's nerves, making her feel lifeless.

"Is he dead?" she asked.

"Not yet. But he's in bad shape."

"Who shot him?"

"One of—your men saw him riding down trail and sent a bullet over his head. He turned back to find out what it was about and he had a hand on his gun. But he didn't get a chance to draw. Red shot first."

"Red?"

"Yeah. Red Taylor. Higgins sent me over here, and Taylor showed up just a few minutes ago."

"Where is he now?"

The waddy's eyes narrowed. "Where would you expect? Naturally he left—went away quick."

Alva caught back her own, swift words. Even Murphy, one of her own outfit, seemed to believe she was behind the outbreak of violence! And Red Taylor, who had shot the Boxed O rider, had been in Dirk Belding's office with Bess White!

"Put that man into the buckboard and take him to the Boxed O," Alva ordered. "Stay there with him. I'll go to town and send out a doctor."

"But—"

"Get busy," she snapped. "I'll use your pony. Can you handle the man alone?"

"Yeah, sure, but—"

She stepped to his waiting horse, pulled up her skirt and swung into saddle.

When she entered the Flying T yard, Higgins stared, and then began to run.

"What happened?" he called. "You left here in a buckboard!"

"Bring me a fresh pony," she said, cutting through his words.

hurried out again. Higgins was waiting with the pony.

"No matter what happens," Alva said, "there's to be no more gunplay—not even if the Boxed O outfit comes here looking for trouble."

"What are you going to do?" her foreman asked.

"Several things. And that reminds me. Give me your gun."

The foreman's glance met hers and he lifted his Colt from its holster. She pushed it through her belt and as soon as she reached the wagon trail, sent her horse into a long, mile-eating gait for Rawlins.

The animal was blown when she pulled in before Dr. Horton's house and, after being assured that he would leave for the Boxed O at once, she walked along the main street to the bank building. She went upstairs lightly and swiftly now, her whole body tense.

She knocked on Belding's door and opened it before he could finish saying, "Come in."

His eyes swelled against their heavy lids and he shot to his feet.

"Miss Roberts!"

"Yes." She walked to his desk, stood across from it, looking at him. "I'm glad I found you in. I'm looking for Red Taylor, one of my riders. Maybe you know where he is?"

"How would I know?" asked Belding.

Her glance remained fixed on his bulging eyes.

"Perhaps he told you, when he was here today," she said. "He was leaving just as I came in. Bess White was with him."

"Oh? Well, that might be. Lots of people are in and out of here. Seems there was a young fellow with Bess, but I don't remember his name."

"Perhaps this will help you to remember. Red Taylor just shot a Boxed O waddy."

Belding was silent, but his strange smile was still on his lips, more hideous than a grimace.

"I'm beginning to believe," Alva went on, speaking slowly, "that Red Taylor had orders from you to start trouble with Jake Brandon's men. Maybe Bill Allen had, too. It would be worth money to you to have a range war, or at least have a serious fight start. That would let you run the price of the southeast section up to many times what it's worth—because neither side would let themselves be outbid."

CHAPTER V

Face to Face

IN THE house, Alva ran up the stairs, and before long, dressed in riding clothes,

He sat down and looked at her with vast amusement.

"You have a vivid imagination," he told her. "But even if this wasn't just something you dreamed up and you'd hit on the truth, what could you do about it?"

Her breath slowed and caught. And she realized exactly what Belding was—a dishonest, cunning trickster who could become overbearing when he felt such arrogance to be safe.

"You can't convict a man on feminine intuition or guesswork," he added. "You haven't a single witness to back up such a wild story, so we'll just forget all about it. When your option runs out I'll sell to the highest bidder."

"Don't be so sure. Eventually, either Red Taylor or Bill Allen will talk—especially if it's made worthwhile."

Belding laughed. "You can try, but who'll take your word or theirs? It'll look as if you paid them so you could outsmart me and get the land for almost nothing by accusing me."

Alva's lips parted, but she held back the swift, angry words and turned away. She walked steadily through the door and closed it behind her.

But then she halted, and her shoulders drooped in defeat. Coming here had been a mistake, and by telling Belding that she suspected him she had made it possible for him to cover up. He would probably make sure, now, that she had no chance of finding Red Taylor.

Someone was coming up the stairs. Walking swiftly. She left the office door and came face to face with Jake Brandon. His glance, the thin gray of a knife blade, ran over her, but the straight lines of his mouth relaxed in surprise.

"Alva! What are you doing here?"

She moved her shoulders impatiently. "Nothing, I guess. I had an idea, but it wasn't so good, after all."

Her words trailed off as she saw the man who had followed Jake up the stairs and now stood uncertainly behind him.

"Bill Allen!"

The waddy jerked off his hat and his glance uneasily shifted away from her.

"Afternoon, ma'am."

"Have you seen Red Taylor?" she demanded. "He shot one of the Boxed O outfit a little while ago."

BRANDON'S hand touched her shoulder, closed on it and turned her around to face him.

"Did he kill him? Who was the waddy?"

"No, he's not dead," she explained quickly, telling herself that his touch meant nothing now, that her pulses were not stirring in answer.

"So, you figured Belding might know something about Red Taylor," Jake murmured, when she finished. "We're just going in to see Belding. You'd better come with us."

His hand slid down to hers and he led her back to the door. Pushing it open, he strode in ahead of her. She saw Belding on his feet, his eyes darting from Brandon to Bill Allen.

"Howdy," Brandon drawled. "Seemed like it was time to pay you another call, Belding. I got to talking to Allen, here, and he told me quite a story. Seems he ran into you in the bar where he was celebrating pay-day and you gave him a hundred dollars to start a row with one of my boys who was doing some drinking at the same time."

Belding's slight body snapped erect. "That's a lie!"

"Cut it," the young waddy said. "I wouldn't have taken your money except that I was half-drunk and didn't know what I was doing. That's why I took a job with the Boxed O, too. I was ashamed, after I sobered up, to go back to the Flying T and it wasn't hard figuring out what your game was."

"I still say it's a lie!" The land operator spoke swiftly, and one hand dropped below the top of the desk, into an open drawer.

It came up holding a revolver, and Jake Brandon's Colt barked. Belding's gun clattered to the floor and he clutched at his bleeding wrist with his left hand.

"Now sit down," Jake said, moving the Colt meaningfully. "After I write out all the facts and you sign it—your left hand'll do for that—I'm going to find Taylor and settle with him, too."

Alva, watching the land agent sink obediently into his chair, drew a long, careful breath. The messy business of the southeast section was settled now. At least, the Flying T could no longer be suspected of killing to protect a small piece of range. And she no longer cared what happened to the grassland. She wanted only to stop seeing the cunning-faced Belding, the young puncher he had bribed, and Jake Brandon. Especially Jake Brandon.

She opened the door quietly, started to speak, but changed her mind and stepped out into the hall. She ran down the stairs and, as she neared the bottom, thought she heard Jake calling her name. But she did not pause or glance back. . . .

Alva let her pony set his own pace back to the Flying T, and she made herself think of anything and everything except Jake Brandon. That was done, and in time maybe the feeling of emptiness would disappear.

But at the forks above the Green River Branch, she pulled in, glanced up the eastern trail, and then wheeled her pony. Perhaps it would be fairer to find out the whole truth about Red Taylor's association with Belding. And Bess White could give it to her.

Alva rode into the Crossed Y yard, to the sun-blistered, uncared-for house and knocked at the door. When it opened, Bess stared out at her, then stepped to the porch, closing the door behind her.

"We can talk better outside," she said hurriedly. "It's so crowded in the house."

Alva nodded and let Bess lead the way into the yard. But as they reached her pony, Alva turned abruptly.

"I left Bill Allen, who used to work for me, in Belding's office," she said. "Belding paid Allen to start trouble with the Boxed O. He also hired Red Taylor to shoot one of Jake Brandon's outfit."

Bess went still and her eyes stared blankly.

"Who told you that?" she demanded.

"Now I understand why you came to see me," Alva ignored her question. "You weren't trying to protect Jake or to save his ranch. You wanted to be sure I—or one of us—would pay anything Belding might ask."

"All right." Bess' hazel eyes were glinting, and there was no softness about the blond girl now. "What're you going to do? I haven't been guilty of anything the least bit illegal. Dirk was careful about that, because he doesn't want me in trouble. But if I could fool you and Jake Brandon, why there's no law against it."

ALVA drew a breath which felt sharp against her lips.

"Then your pretense of caring for Jake was just part of the scheme—an act?"

"You didn't really think I was interested in him?" Bess laughed. "What's he got to offer except a dinky little ranch? I'm getting out of this prairie as soon as Dirk Belding's set to leave—and I don't care what anyone thinks of that, either."

"I saw you kissing Jake the other night, in the writing room of the hotel," Alva said.

Bess' eyes lost their narrowness and widened into disbelief.

"Are you trying to be funny? What if I did kiss him? He's attractive. But I'd hate to be in love with every man I've kissed."

Alva went to her pony and stepped up into saddle.

"I wish you happiness," she said. "It's my guess you'll need more than good wishes."

But on the way back to the Flying T, the sense of emptiness and loss grew. Jake Brandon hadn't wanted her, Alva. He was in love with Bess who, knowing that, had used it to help Belding. It was easy now to understand how Bess had acquired her lovely clothes. Easy to understand all about her.

But love was not logical or controlled by reason. It was hunger and need and—despair.

At the forks, Alva swung north and heard a long-drawn call roll up the trail. Reining in her pony, she saw a horseman traveling toward her at top speed. Jake Brandon!

"Why didn't you wait?" he demanded, as he pulled in. "I couldn't leave just then, had to turn Belding over to the sheriff."

"Where is he now?" asked Alva.

"In jail, and he'll stay there until we know about the man Red Taylor shot. If he dies, Belding'll be tried for murder."

She nodded gravely. "He should be. I intended to send you word that I'm having the Flying T stock driven off the southeast range in the morning. It's yours. I wouldn't have it now." She smiled stiffly, and lifted the reins.

But he leaned out of the saddle and caught her arm.

"Hold on. What's this about giving up the section? That doesn't sound like a good business man."

"Maybe not, but it's like a woman. Now—"

"Now," he murmured, and put his free arm around her. Lifting her from the saddle and holding her close to him, he said, low: "there was another little matter I wanted to talk over. Any chance for an hombre who hasn't got anything except a one-man spread? Maybe I ought to say I love you."

Her head jerked up so that she could see his face.

"Love me? Why, you don't even see me! When I went to town this morning I was dressed the way men like. I'd spent hours making myself pretty and feminine, but it didn't make any difference. You acted just the same!"

He frowned. "This morning? You were as beautiful as ever, but what do you mean?"

"But you didn't even notice I was wearing a rose-colored suit and hat!" she cut in, almost savagely.

His frown deepened. "Oh, sure. I did see something different about the hat. But it didn't change you—because you were still the only girl I've ever wanted."

She tried to laugh, but the sound would not come from her throat.

"You've forgotten Bess White and a few of the things you said to me," she said huskily. "Especially about my trying to make you give up that section. And don't look like that! I saw you kiss Bess the other night."

He grinned. "Yeah. She reminded me we'd known each other for a long time, said we might not meet again because she was leaving the range soon. So I kissed her, but even then I was wishing it was you. Honey, I didn't mean anything I said about the grass-land. It was just—well, I hated the idea that I had so little to offer you except my love. I didn't seriously think you were trying to start a range war. I began to suspect Belding of crooked business when young Allen had a fight with one of my men. That's why I bailed him out—wanted to make him friendly enough to talk to me."

"Why didn't you tell me?" she whispered. His head bent even lower and his breath was against her cheek.

"We've talked enough," he said, and took her lips.

Next Issue's Featured Novelets

JACKIE OF THE OPEN RANGE

By STEPHEN PAYNE

THE MONTANA KNIGHT

By SHIRLEY MANNERS

COURAGEOUS GAL

By THELMA KNOLES

CAN YOUR SCALP PASS THE

* F-N TEST?

*The Famous
Finger Nail Test

1 "It's F-N, the test for men!" Scratch your head—if you find dryness or loose dandruff you need Wildroot Cream-Oil. Buy the large economy size.

YOUR HAIR CAN LOOK LIKE THIS WITH NEW
WILDROOT CREAM-OIL

2 Only a little Wildroot Cream-Oil can do a big job for your hair. Keeps your hair well groomed all day long without a trace of that greasy, plastered down look! Your hair looks good and feels good too!

CREAM-OIL CHARLIE SAYS: "IT CONTAINS LANOLIN!"

3 Get Wildroot Cream - Oil from your barber or drug counter and... Tune in the Woody Herman Show every Friday night on ABC (Blue) Network.

Something in his tone recalled the thrill of that stolen kiss

Warrior Draw

By STEPHEN PAYNE

Eileen Donnegan's love for that handsome sheepman could spell only desperate trouble—for as a cowgirl she had to hate him!

A FEELING that she was shipwrecked gripped Eileen Donnegan as the smoke-dust in the wake of the departing Circle D truck faded out in the clear mountain air. As she strained her eyes for a last look, hot sunshine snared itself in her bright hair, touching it with red, and sprinkling tiny freckles across her fine, straight nose.

"What a goose I am to stand here," she exclaimed, putting her hand to her unshaded face. "When, goodness knows, I can burn in five minutes. Here, Rip!" she called to a beautiful collie who was challenging a squirrel in a big pine. "You may not know it but there's work to do around this new domain of ours."

Waving a contemptuous tail at the chattering squirrel, Rip stuck a cold nose against the girl's slim brown hand, and they ran gaily to a small cabin, whose new, rough pine walls were bright against a background of blue spruce. Inside the little house, the dimness was so depressing that Eileen decided to put in the windows and get rid of the heavy building paper which darkened the gaping frames.

Having gathered together the tools she needed, she pulled an ancient sombrero over her wavy hair. This, added to her checkered blue-and-white work shirt, faded blue jeans, and scuffed, low-heeled work shoes, made her look like a real ranchman.

For a moment her thoughtful gaze traveled across noisy, splashing Warrior Creek to the country on the other side of the Valley. This land her father was trying to buy and add to the half which he had already acquired.

Cattlemen in the ranching country below the uplands of the Warrior Mountains had become alarmed by rumors that sheepmen, attracted by rich pasture land, were trying to get a foothold here. In an effort to block this menace, Dennis Donnegan had bought for Eileen a relinquishment on a homestead comprising half of Warrior Draw.

Eileen could best be spared from the busy Circle D outfit to finish proving up on the claim. The records of the land across the creek had proved to be badly mixed. After getting Eileen partially settled, Dennis Donnegan had hurried away to do whatever he could in straightening out the puzzle.

Eileen had studied the verdant land across the creek. There had been no noise then except humming of bees, droning of flies and the saucy chatter of chipmunks and squirrels. Blending with the undertones of the rushing stream it made a tuneful symphony. Except for flashing bird bodies and scurrying little woodland creatures nothing had then been stirring, but now—!

Eileen's golden lashed eyes opened very wide; astonishment made an "Oh!" of her curved red lips. For beneath the trees a quarter of a mile away, there were hundreds of grayish-white animals which could be nothing else than sheep! Daddy was too late after all. Someone had beaten him to possession of the rest of Warrior Draw, and had brought hated woollies to mock the Donnegans.

sashes leaning against the wall. At this instant, Rip bounded past her and stopped on the river's rocky bank, barking a lusty challenge.

"Hush, Rip!" commanded Eileen, sadly. "There's nothing we can do about that—outrage. But let's not give them the satisfaction of noticing the blats." When Rip however disregarded her order, she added, "Daddy will be so mad. And he'll have a right to be."

Adding noise of plane and hammer to Rip's explosions, Eileen had the first window almost fitted into the frame when she heard a voice behind her.

"Hi there, young fellow! I came over to say 'hello' to my neighbors. Perhaps, you and your hound can watch my sheep for me sometimes."

Eileen almost wrecked the window as she spun around on the heels of her dusty, flat-heeled shoes, and met the friendly regard of a long-legged, muscular young man. The stranger, discovering his mistake in a glance, let a cheerful grin slowly crinkle the corners of his dancing blue eyes.

"Gosh, ma'am, excuse me! In levis and work shirt, with your head covered by that hat, I took you for a boy. On second thought, though, I'm glad you ain't. It'll make running sheep a pleasure when there's someone like you close by to brighten life."

Eileen measured him with hostile orbs. At the same time a curious little thrill pricked her nerves at the open admiration she read on his blond, irregular features so near her own stormy face. He was a hated sheepman, a menace to Circle D and the entire cattle world she knew.

Yet she unconsciously compared him with cattleman Roy Pollock, whose long time persistent courtship had become quite boring to her. He too looked at her with open admiration, but never yet had his glances brought a thrill to warm her cool indifference.

But Roy was a cowman, and that was important. She remembered this with a little shock of astonishment that this handsome sheepman could have made her forget it.

"This side of Warrior Creek is cattle country. Sheep and sheepmen aren't welcome here," she said curtly.

"That so?" returned the man. The grin vanished and a tight little muscle stood out white along the line of his jaw.

"A sheepman's a sort of devil, I s'pose?"

EILEEN turned her back on the hateful sight and picked up one of the window

His teeth gleamed white with his returning grin. "It ain't as if I'm running my flock where there's already cows, and I can say that I'm as honest as any cattleman, Miss—?"

Eileen ignored the questioning inflection. "My name's Bill Peterson, which makes me 'Pete' to my friends." He added easily, "And I hope we will be friends."

What nerve the fellow had, telling her he was as honest as a cattleman! Eileen's temper boiled, and her voice was like the crackling of leaves crisped by autumn's frost.

"There has never been friendship between cattlemen and sheepmen, so I have none to offer you."

"In other words, 'Get over where you belong and stay there'?" he said coolly. Under the casual words Eileen discerned faintly mocking amusement.

"If I stay on my side of the creek, you can't do less than stay on yours," explained Eileen, her hostility lessened.

After all, she wasn't responsible for the appearance of this good-looking young man, and it was rather cheering to know a strong arm was near by if there was need of one. Not that she'd ever avail herself of it. Oh, no! And she wasn't striking up a friendship with him, either.

"Well," said Pete, a wicked gleam in his eye, "just to make sure I don't forget you—or you me—!"

Catching her to him, he tipped up her bewitching face, and before she could even gasp, his lips met hers, warmly and passionately.

"Please excuse me for this," he breathed, releasing her after a long minute, "but I can't say I'm sorry. You're the loveliest girl I've ever seen!"

While she stood there, a tangle of emotions holding her speechless, the man turned and without a backward glance, nonchalantly vaulted the rushing stream, and walked rapidly up the hill.

"Well, I never!" said Eileen, catching her full lower lip between her sharp white teeth. "He has more nerve than even a sheepman should have! Yet somehow, I have a feeling that it would please him if I told him off for this. I'll have to think of some other way to bring him down."

MORE upset than she liked by this encounter, in which she had not come out victorious, Eileen made all kinds of mistakes with her work. Pounding her thumb, scratching her arms on the splintery pine walls, she was finally balked by a refractory window which wouldn't go in place. Her irritation focused on the intruder with the sheep. Too nervous to listen any longer to the constant blatting which she could not shut out of her ears, she called Rip and walked over the hills beyond her cabin.

When she returned toward dusk, she went into her cabin without glancing across the creek. She fixed supper for herself, fed Rip, who was ravenous, and went to bed. Drugged by the cool mountain air and the music of Warrior Creek, she fell into dreamless sleep.

Eight hours later, Rip's cold nose against her hand awakened her, and she tumbled out of bed, dismayed to discover she had slept so long. Dressing swiftly, she ran to the creek for water, and almost fell in when she saw on the other side of the draw, where yesterday there had been only grass and rocks and trees, a new tent-house, complete with stove pipe and doorstep.

A cheerful whistling added itself to Nature's morning orchestra, and Pete walked around the corner of the new house.

"Morning, neighbor!" he called above the stream's chatter. "Swell day, ain't it? You feel lonesome last night? If I'm to keep on being honest, I must admit I did, busy as I was."

Eileen swung the water pail carelessly, scattering rainbow drops.

"My name is Eileen Donnegan," she said. It wouldn't hurt if he knew her name. "Neighbor" was a very indefinite title. "Goodness! What a lot of work you have done on your sheep range!"

"I worked most of the night, thanks to a generous moon," he explained. "Got an old corral up at the edge of the timber to hold my flock nights. Did you ever get things from mail order houses? It's almost too good to believe, what one can get. Even nail holes are drilled, and diagrams show just how to put things together."

"First time I ever fooled with this sort of stuff, but I haven't time now to put up a better shack. Not bad, is it?" nodding toward the tent house.

Piqued because Pete so completely ignored yesterday's disconcerting episode, though she should have been grateful because he did, Eileen stooped to fill her pail. A second later Pete was beside her.

"Let me do that. It's a big pail. Then what say to your coming over and having breakfast with me, and take a look at my layout?" he asked. His strong teeth glistened in the morning sunlight.

Angrier than ever because she felt she couldn't give in, and she'd like to, Eileen answered him shortly.

"I couldn't get across the creek without getting wet, or riding one of my ponies and that's too much bother."

"Now that's really too bad," said Pete apparently serious, although Eileen thought she detected a tinge of mockery in the words. "Let me show you how easy it would be!"

He put down the pail, and turned to her with a purposefulness which sent her heart into a series of jumps and starts that drained all the soft rose stain from the oval of her face.

"Oh, no! I'll come some other time. I slept so late I must get to work at once." She put out her hand, defensively.

Pete's blue eyes rested on her with searching intensity, and color again flooded Eileen's face. It seemed he must be reading her heart and learning that the thought of being in his arms again, had made her afraid of her own feelings.

"Thank you for filling my pail," she hurried on. "You really shouldn't bother with me."

"I wouldn't if I didn't like it," was the answer. "Like it better than—than anything else I could do."

While she fitted the rest of the sashes, and washed all the windows until they sparkled, Eileen was acutely conscious of Bill Peterson. Surreptitious glances showed her how carefully he herded the band of sheep. On the open upland she noticed also that some of them were Merinos, and therefore especially valuable.

Unlike an ordinary sheep herder, however, Pete didn't loaf in idleness while they grazed, but skillfully cut and trimmed a dozen or so slim jackpines and dragged them near his cabin.

Toward evening, restless, and tired from her own strenuous work, Eileen took another walk with Rip, and it was practically dark when she came back. There was no light in the tent-house and when she finally tumbled into bed, she saw with a desolate feeling that everything was still completely dark across the creek.

and stared at Rip, who had dashed ahead. He was running from one side of the stream to the other, across a sturdy new bridge of recently cut jackpines. Pete must have been working last night by moonlight again!

A now familiar figure strode to the creek bank, his blue eyes dancing.

"Don't order me to tear it out, Eileen, please. See how Rip has taken to it."

How was it this Bill Peterson had the ability to "take the wind out of her sails" before she had even laid her course? To object to the bridge would be mighty small-minded, and it did add to the attractiveness of the scene.

"You did all of this last night? I slept so hard I didn't hear anything," she said casually.

"I was very careful not to trespass," said Pete solemnly. "I stood in the water to work on your side. It was cold, too!"

"I know it was. I hope you got warm later." Eileen shivered.

"I got warm taking a good horseback ride." Why should she care whether or not Bill Peterson took nocturnal rides? Yet insistently, Eileen did care. He should stay here in Warrior Draw, and not leave the sheep alone. Or was it herself she had in mind?

As Pete filled her pail and walked with her to her house, he looked down on the shining waves of her brown hair.

"Can't I persuade you to share my supper tonight, Eileen? I have some fresh trout—beauties." Something in his tone recalled the thrill of that stolen kiss and she flushed.

Why not? They were both lonesome.

"I'd love it," she said warmly. And to her own amazement added, "If you'll share mine tomorrow."

What was she thinking of! Why, this was more than signing a truce with the sheepman! This was fraternizing as though he were a friend. But only a friend, of course.

At supper time Pete proved he was a whiz at frying fish. He also produced cornbread baked in his little sheet-iron stove to a perfect golden brown, and the coffee that he made was strong and hot and good. Eileen cleaned her plate of every crumb.

Nor did Pete forget Rip, who got a big bone, which, although it looked suspiciously like a leg of lamb, neither Eileen nor he questioned!

They had finished the dishes, and Eileen was hanging damp tea towels on a wild cur-

WHEN she went to get water from the creek next morning, she stopped rant bush when the clatter of hoofs filled the air. Along the road which connected Warrior Draw with the lower country, came a rider on a big brown horse. The girl's eyes went wide with surprise as she recognized her persistent suitor, Roy Pollock of the P C outfit.

"Friend of yours, Eileen? He's looking at us crankier'n a disappointed billy goat." Pete was standing at her elbow.

The girl started swiftly toward the bridge, but the rider, swinging from his horse, crossed before she reached it. Roy Pollock's eyes, passing rapidly over the scene, missed nothing. They had never reminded Eileen more of a ferret's eyes, black and sharp and suspicious.

"Pleasant, homey atmosphere around here, isn't there?" His attempt to sound jocular failed to conceal his hostility. "I don't believe I've had the pleasure of meeting your neighbor." He cast an insolent glance toward Pete.

An instant later his insolent expression became angry in alarm. "Sheep! This fellow's brought sheep in here, has he? And you've been paying him a call, Eileen?" He pointed to the grayish shadows in the old corral.

"Of course they're sheep! What did you think they were?" Roy's arrogant manner ruffled Eileen intensely.

Roy's small eyes shot sparks.

"You mean you don't mind sheep? Having 'em right here in Warrior Draw doesn't disturb you? Eileen, my dear, you must have lost all your pride, hobnobbing with a sheepman!"

"Don't be stupid, Roy!" she snapped. She had a strange feeling of guilt. "I dislike sheep as much as I ever did. But I can't do anything about them, so why not enjoy Pete's company, even if he is a sheepman? Pete's all right. This is Bill Peterson, Roy. Bill, this is—"

She turned, thinking the young sheepman was behind her, and saw him walking rapidly up the slope past his house.

"The sheep are safe for the night, Eileen, and I've some other fish to fry. Big ones! See you in the morning," he called back.

AS EILEEN reached the end of the bridge, Roy grabbed her hands and pulled her to him, his glance traveling from her to Pete's rapidly disappearing figure.

"The unspeakable gall of that fellow! You know what it means to your dad and the Circle D to keep this stretch of land, Eileen, yet you make friends with him. Haven't I some rights, too?" His voice grew softer.

"Don't be stuffy, Roy! If I didn't know all about the need for getting possession of Warrior Draw, I wouldn't be here. Let me show you how beautiful it is, over those hills beyond my simple mansion. Another valley, not as large as this, and much more wild."

In spite of her attempts to divert his interest, Roy kept returning to the subject of the menace of Pete's sheep. Finally they returned to the shack. Roy prepared to leave.

"Nobody's watchin' the woollies. I'll just slip over the creek, let 'em out of their corral and whoop 'em down the canyon. Some'll get killed and the rest'll be scattered to the ends of the earth," he said abruptly.

He was starting toward the bridge when Eileen caught his arm. Though she hated sheep she had to stop him.

"Stop, Roy! That's a contemptible plan! There'll be some other way to get rid of the sheep, I'm sure. We know who has the other half of the draw, and we can deal with him. Daddy can buy him out."

"You're acting mighty queer for the daughter of a cattleman!" snapped Pollock. "It can't be that you've fallen for Peterson? Why, I mean I thought that you and me—"

Eileen interrupted decisively.

"This is not your territory or your property, Roy, and until I see Daddy I'll act as I think best under the circumstances. There's nothing more to say now except goodnight."

Muttering grumpily, Roy got on his horse and clattered off, followed by Eileen's sigh of relief. How he bored her! Especially after gay, light-hearted Pete. Not that she was in love with Pete. That was impossible. She represented cattle and he represented sheep. There could be no love between them!

She called Rip into the house. But the big dog acted restless and uneasy, and this uneasiness communicated itself to her. Finally in an effort to quiet her nerves she went outdoors. Instantly Rip began to growl, and the hackles on his neck ruffled angrily.

The rays of a late-rising moon lighted the far side of the draw, and showed someone near the sheep corral, moving purposefully, yet furtively. Eileen watched for a few seconds, then ordered Rip down and quiet. She ran to get her gun. Then, invisible in the shadows, the girl and the dog silently crossed the bridge, avoiding the moonlight; they kept close among the trees until they were almost at the sheep pen.

The man had already thoroughly disturbed the sheep and had started to open the pen.

"Stop! Or I'll shoot," Eileen called sharply.

The fellow pivoted and the moonlight fell on his face.

"Roy!" cried Eileen. "You wouldn't do that!"

"I would, Eileen! And I will, too!" he snorted. "Give me that gun!"

He sprang toward her. With a lunge, Rip leaped forward hitting the gun in Eileen's hand as he passed her. Fire shot into the darkness, and with a yell of pain, Roy Pollock grabbed his left hand.

Sometime later, after Eileen had bandaged Roy's hand and helped him onto his horse, she advised him curtly not to come back to Warrior Draw. She felt that she never wanted to see him again.

"I don't intend to let that walloper get away with both sheep and my girl," he returned sullenly.

"You're mistaken about that 'my girl', Roy!" Eileen corrected coldly.

If she had ever had any feeling for him it was gone now.

On the following morning, melodious whistling which rose above the clatter of the stream woke Eileen to a day of full sunshine. By the time she had dressed, Pete was carrying water to her door. His presence made her heart leap.

"Do you think it's safe to leave your sheep alone at night?" she demanded. "What if someone who hates woollies should decide to do them some harm?"

"Perhaps it isn't entirely safe," he answered, regarding her with a new expression in his laughing dark eyes. "But just now I can't help it. Anyhow, you and Pollock are the only ones who have discovered my guilt, and nothing's happened yet. Before long I will be able to tell you—"

The way he suddenly bit off the sentence, and his change in expression, brought a flutter to the girl's heart. However, she had decided that she would not tell him of Roy's cowardly attempt to scatter the sheep.

SOME minutes later Pete returned to his side of the creek and about noon Eileen saw a horseman clatter down the draw, and rein his horse up sharply at the tent-house.

"Hi, Peterson," the visitor's voice came to her ears. "I got a message for you. Important, too."

While Rip awakened echoes with his challenge to the stranger, Eileen watched the confab which followed.

"Help me get the woollies into their corral, Stan, and I'll go with you," she heard Pete say.

The two hurried up the slope to where the sheep were grazing, and on their return, Pete shouted to the girl.

"Got to be away the rest of the afternoon, Eileen. But I'll be back by dark."

Trying to throw off a sense of desolation, Eileen got a bite of lunch for herself and Rip. Half an hour later, she was surprised to notice rapidly increasing gloom. Black clouds were appearing above the towering peaks on the high range, forcing the lighter ones to scud ahead of them toward the valley occupied by Donnegan's Circle D and Roy Pollock's P C ranch.

Her earlier apprehension and oppression returned as she scolded herself.

"Ninny! What's the matter with you? You've seen plenty of storms, blizzards, thunder storms, hail, wind. You're not getting jittery all at once, are you? You're sort of a pioneer here. Take the storms with the sunshine, in your stride."

Nevertheless, she noticed the uneasiness and fear of her two saddle ponies picketed on a grassy spot nearby. She pulled up the picket pins and led them up the hillside to a sheltering, shallow cave under huge, overhanging rocks, where she tied them.

Coming down the hill, she looked across at Pete's sheep corral. Something was disturbing the sheep, something more than just the imminence of the storm. Through the sheets of rain she made out a man working, furiously at the side of the corral. Rip was standing on the bridge barking at the stranger. Eileen ran to the bridge. The man was wrenching posts from the corral fence!

How she crossed the bridge, and raced up the opposite slope with Rip beside her was never very clear in Eileen's memory. But she knew she had to save Pete's sheep. She had not quite reached the marauder when he straightened, letting out a great whoop that started the sheep pouring through the opening in the fence.

"Hold him, Rip!" she ordered the collie in a low, tense tone.

Instantly the dog leaped. The man's frenzied hands beat against the surprising attack of the animal. Rip's jaws had closed on the black slicker, yet his weight was pulling it chokingly tight as he held on, growling dangerously deep in his throat. As the man whirled, trying to throw the dog off, Eileen recognized Ed Bray, one of Roy Pollock's hands, a ratty, unprepossessing individual that she had always distrusted.

The sheep were beginning to scatter across the small pasture between the trees and the rocky hills, when a sheet of yellow-red lightning cracked the sky from one side of Warrior Draw to the other, and heavier rain pounded down upon the world.

Bray was trying to get into his pocket. Eileen, guessing he had a gun, managed to slip her own hand into the pocket as he moved past her, and pulled out a Colt .45.

HOLDING the weapon uncompromisingly on a level with his head she said sternly:

"Take your choice, Ed Bray. Stop a bullet and have Rip tear you apart, or help me get these sheep back into the corral!"

"You win," sputtered Bray. "What can a feller do when he's got a nasty brute chokin' him to death?"

Thanks mostly to Rip, for Bray gave only sudden assistance and Eileen was too distrustful of him to dare put away the gun, the sheep were soon herded back to their corral. When every animal was safe, and Eileen was making Ed nail up the fence, a shout made them both jump and Bill Peterson's steaming, lathered horse came out of the rain and skidded to a stop beside them.

"Eileen! Thank God I got here in time!"

He leaped to the ground and pulled her to him, his face full of tender concern that brought blood crowding to her cheeks and a happy radiance in her eyes.

"How did you find out that your sheep were in danger?" she asked, thinking that was what he meant.

"The sheep—! I knew nothing about trouble with the sheep, darling," he answered. "A flood is racing down Warrior Creek. I was afraid I couldn't outrun it and get to you."

Her heart leaped. It was her safety that had brought him racing back. This was what she wanted—Pete and Warrior Draw. A loud ominous roaring startled her and she looked toward the creek.

The water was surging and tossing over the boulders like a vicious animal straining to reach its prey.

Seeing attention diverted from himself for a moment, Ed Bray made a dash to escape, and was completely lost in the murky gloom.

"Stop him, Pete! He let the sheep out so they'd scatter around in the storm," Eileen shrieked.

"Let him go," Pete cried above the wind and roar of the creek. "It's more important for us to get to safety, sweetheart."

"There's a cave on the hill above the cabin," Eileen replied. "Oh, there goes the bridge!"

The turbulent water wrenched loose the little structure and began savagely to tear it to pieces.

Holding the girl with one arm, Pete jumped on his horse, and spurred toward the creek. Twice, three times, the bay balked beside the surging waters before he finally obeyed the spurs and plunged in. Eileen, held securely in the circle of Pete's arm, sent up a fervent little prayer as the animal slipped and almost lost its footing. Only Pete's experienced skill brought them safely to the farther shore, from where they raced to the rock cave.

THE ceiling of the heavens seemed torn away to let rain fall in gray sheets. Weird streaks of lightning smeared the heavy gloom, and thunder shook the earth. It was almost impossible to hear each other's voices. Rip's nervous barking was oddly thinned. Yet with her head close to Pete's lips and his arms around her Eileen heard his words.

"If you didn't love me, darling, you wouldn't have risked your life trying to save my woollies. I've loved you from the second you told me that you had no friendship for a sheepman, so I began to hurry matters to get rid of the sheep. That was what took me away at night."

"Then you're not going to be a sheepman, any more?" she asked. A great content and happiness filled her heart.

"I'd been a cattleman all my life, Eileen, until I got these woollies. I got them only because I needed money quickly. I could realize more in a shorter time with them than with cattle."

"In another valley, not far from Warrior Draw, I had located a ranch, but to buy it took more cash than I had. At last, though I've got what I need. The fellow who came today brought word that the man who's been dickering for the sheep would meet my terms."

Eileen pulled herself around to look into Pete's dark eyes with alarm.

"He isn't going to keep them here in Warrior Draw, is he?"

"Never, sweetheart!" he answered. "You and I own Warrior Draw. We'll use it for our cattle. 'Our' cattle understand. We are going to be married as soon as you can tell your dad and I can rustle up a parson to tie the knot?"

"Yes," said Eileen, meekly. Then, after a long kiss which made her heart pound more tumultuously than the storm, "Now we can build a house on my side of the stream."

"You're mistaken, darling," contradicted Pete fondly. "We'll build part on each side, and have a porch over the stream, high enough above the creek so no flood can take it away."

Eileen forgot the storm, the roaring of the stream, as Pete enfolded her in his arms and kissed her rain-spattered face. Rip barked inquisitively.

But they didn't hear him.

YOUNG MAN YOU'RE FRESH!

NATURALLY... I JUST HAD A FRESH STAR SHAVE!

FOR DOUBLE EDGE RAZORS

MADE BY 6NX
PROCESS

They're back! Those keener Star Blades that make your double edge razor perform miracles. Try them—for an amazing high in low-cost shaving luxury!

4 for 10¢

FOR SINGLE EDGE RAZORS

Look well, feel swell—after a shave with Star, the single edge blade millions of men proved with billions of shaves!

Star Division, American Safety Razor Corp.,
Brooklyn 1, N. Y.

4 for 10¢

Branding Fire Song Book

By TEX BROWN

HOWDY, friends and neighbors. How's the tonsils? Oiled up for a little singing? We been writin' and hearin' a lot of songs about how lonesome cowboys was. As a matter of fact, the idea of lonesomeness and cowpokes goes together just like ham and eggs, or something.

But there's more reason to the term "lonesome cowboy" than a feller would think at first. Like the radio folks say, "tain't funny, Magee."

The fact is that punchin' cows on a big spread today, or almost any spread in the days before fences, was a sure enough tough job for a hombre from the standpoint of leadin' a normal life.

How the Average Young Cowpoke Lived

Look at how an average young cowpoke might have to live. Suppose he went to work for a big outfit in the Fall. They send him out to a linecamp maybe twenty miles from nowhere where he'd only have the company of his riding string, a few rangy steers, a lot of hoot owls, coyotes and wolves and maybe a few blizzards and snowstorms to caress his cheeks.

He'd stay there all winter. Then in the spring they'd round up the stuff, work it, cut out all they wanted to send up to higher ground to fatten, and he'd be off up into the mountains to set and watch the stuff fatten all summer without going to town. Then comes Fall, and the old man rounds up a herd of fat stuff and tells him to streak off to market with it, and be sure to git back pronto.

Well, he ain't been workin' around in locations where the gals was thick enough to git in your hair. He might go four-six months without ever seein' a gal. Then he'd get maybe a short time in which to get acquainted with some pretty miss, and then have to ride.

He Was Apt to Fall Pretty Hard!

So, naturally, bein' where he had to live such a lonely life, he was pretty apt to fall pretty hard for her in a mighty short time.

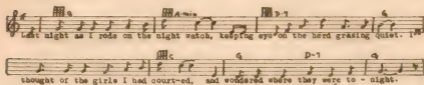

But the pore guy never got to be around her long enough for them to really get to know each other any too well, before he was gone again.

So, he had been in love, then found himself gone, and he'd have to look around on short notice and find him another gal. And so it went.

Some of those old rannies would marry and quit that moving here and there business, but that practically meant that they was through as all around cowpokes. About all they could do would be settle down on some small fenced place and stick with it. But, I reckon they was just as well off, because a man living all his life without any family life of his own ain't what is likely to be a happy man.

So don't laugh. A cowboy wouldn't probably come out and admit personal to anybody that he was a lonesome kind of guy, but he managed to express it impersonally by singing songs about the other cowpoke that was lonely. But he ain't foolin' nobody, is he? It's himself he's singing about all the time!

THE COWBOY'S MEMORIES

2.

*Sweet Concha Lopez, on the Border,
I almost asked her for her hand,
With a face and a form like an angel,
But a temper that no man could stand.*

3.

*There was Mary Jo Lane, from Nogales,
A sweet little gal with red hair,
But her dad wouldn't think of her marrying,
So I took the long trail from there.*

4.

*Jim Beck, my pal, had a sister,
Her name it was Caroline Beck,
She thought she was too good for a cowpoke,
And again my heart was a wreck!*

5.

*That widow from down South of Phoenix,
Had a ma and three or four kids,
Had me going all of one winter,
But the crowd put my love on the skids.*

6.

*I've taken my love where I've found it,
And dropped it when wanting to roam.
So now I'm just a wandering waddy,
With the ground and a warbag for home!*

WESTERN RANCH GIRLS

by FOGHORN CLANCY

FAMOUS RANCH AND RODEO EXPERT

DOWN in Fort Worth, Texas, the football team of Texas Christian University and its admirers were throwing a ball. They had just hammered out a close victory over the tough Rice Institute team and they felt they had cause to celebrate. Spirits were gay, the music was blithe and they danced in spite of bruises and aches.

Visiting celebrities joined the victory blow-out. There was a student from Fordham University, in New York. As he watched the dancers, he suddenly reached out to touch his Texas host's arm.

"Who is that gorgeous blonde?" he asked.

The Texan followed his eyes.

"You mean the one surrounded by all the men? That's Patricia Clark. And she's just Clark is five feet four inches tall, weighs a hundred and ten pounds, has light golden hair which photographs darker but looks almost silver under a Texas sun, and hazel eyes.

She lives on the San Gabriel Ranch, which is just outside the town of Georgetown, Texas. The San Gabriel is not a big ranch by Texas standards, some six thousand acres. But it is without doubt one of the most beautiful spots in the state.

The San Gabriel River winds around two sides of the pasture land down in the valley. The prairie rolls up into the foothills where the timber grows thicker and on up, almost to the base of six peaks which stand in a row like so many Indian teepees.

Pat's father, Dr. Clark, is a versatile man who combines several careers in one. He raises some cattle, but more Karakul sheep than cattle and more fine quarter horses than sheep. Quarter horses, as western fans will know, are the fastest short distance horses in the world and it is probably her association with these fast horses that has made Pat such an excellent rider.

Her Own Pony

She started to ride about the same time she started to walk and when she was seven received her own pony as a Christmas gift from her father. The pony was too big to hang on the Christmas tree so he was just tied to it where it stood out in the patio.

Pat named the pony "Tar Baby" because he was black and then she set out to do some serious riding. She covered more ground than the Texas Rangers.

The Clark name goes back to the famous Clark of the Lewis and Clark expedition. Pat's great-grandfather was a cousin of the famous explorer.

He migrated to Texas from Kentucky in

PAT CLARK

as nice as she is pretty."

"She would be a sensation in New York," the easterner murmured.

"What do you mean 'would be'? She was. Three times."

"Three times? How'd they let her get away? Come on, let's have the story."

Since the place to begin a story is at the beginning, here are the vital statistics: Pat

Meet Pat Clark of the San Gabriel Ranch,

Pat Clark on a favorite mount

1834, when Texas was still under Mexican rule. In 1873 he founded Texas Christian University at Fort Worth. It was about this time too, that Texas came into its own in the cattle industry. Thousands and thousands of head started northward in the great trail drives to market.

On her mother's side of the family, Pat's great-grandfather came out to Texas from Louisiana in an ox-drawn wagon in 1857. He bought a huge ranch that covered parts of Stephens, Eastland and Palo Pinto Counties, but sold it during the drought of 1890.

Thirty years later the greatest oil field in the world was discovered on that ranch. Where the ranch headquarters once stood there mushroomed the boom oil town of Ranger.

Going back that far makes Pat a dyed-in-the-wool Texan. She raises her own quarter horses and her favorite mount is "Sugar," a Palomino quarter horse whose pedigree goes back along a line of equine aristocrats including Gold Play, Fair Play and Man O' War.

Pat is also an expert swimmer, for there is a lake on the San Gabriel ranch and swimming rates very close to her other two loves: riding and dancing.

Raised in the lap of luxury, by proud and wealthy parents, Patricia Clark might easily have grown into a haughty little snob. But there is too much pioneer blood in her, the blood of people who knew privation and hunger and poverty, who worked with their hands and met the dangers and discouragements of life in the wilderness. She has charm and a radiant disposition that made her a favorite as far back as grade school days.

Texas—a True-Blue Daughter of the West!

Upon finishing high school, Pat enrolled at the University of Texas in Austin, and went on to be graduated with high honors. During these college years she attended many rodeos in Texas.

She usually entered the sponsor girls' contests and her beauty, charm and horsemanship won prizes for her consistently. She was always in demand and always given a place near the head of the parade.

She was the star of the Dance of Rangeland, the unique square dance on horseback. Her training in this dance came from her father, who is an expert in such matters, having originated and organized the famous Abilene horseback square dance troupe.

When the war came, Pat enrolled with the Red Cross as a home nurse. She gave more than her allotted time each week though she had plenty to do on the home ranch, short-handed due to the exodus of cowboys to the armed forces.

Won Bathing Beauty Contest

Once, in 1943, she branched out in a new kind of competition, just for the ride. She won a bathing beauty contest at Bergstrom Field, Texas.

It was in 1943, at the close of the Colorado City, Texas, rodeo that Patricia had what she claims to be her greatest thrill. Scouts from the World's Championship Rodeo in Madison Square Garden, New York invited her to be one of the range glamour girls at the great New York show.

They had watched her win the sponsor girl's contest, saw her ride her beautiful Palomino like the wind through the maze of twists and turns of the quadrille, noted the chic figure, the radiant smile, the golden hair streaming in the sunshine. They knew a good thing when they saw it.

This invitation to the big time rodeo is considered one of the greatest honors that can be given any Western girl, so there was reason for Patricia's excitement. She went to New York with the grim determination to make good for the name of Clark and to make her parents proud of her.

She succeeded. Her friendly, unassuming manner, her beauty and horsemanship so captivated the New York fans that the rodeo management invited her back for 1944. But having made the grade, Pat felt it was more important, and more her duty, to stay with the Red Cross and the work on her dad's ranch than to take so much time out for another trip to New York. After the war—

Sure enough, the management hadn't forgotten her, despite the lapse of a year. The invitation was repeated in 1945 and again Patricia Clark was one of the featured range glamour girls of the World's Championship Rodeo. She was one of the only three girls ever to appear the second year.

Pat has appeared as sponsor girl at such rodeos as Big Springs, Spur, Colorado City, Brownwood, Abilene, Midland, Coleman, Ballinger, San Angelo, Stamford and elsewhere.

She didn't always take first prize because the competition in the sponsor girls' contests in Texas is sometimes much keener than in other events. Besides which, the Texas girls are the most beautiful and talented girls in the world—ask any Texan—so she always had really tough competition. But if she sometimes failed to cop first prize, she never failed to win the admiration of the fans.

Never Totes a Gun

Although she is a good shot and can hold her own on the rifle range, Pat never totes a sixgun. The San Gabriel ranch is no longer wild, untamed country as it was when her forefathers drove cattle up its trails.

She can handle a lariat expertly when it is necessary, but admits freely that she will rope cattle only when it is urgent. Her 110 pound weight is too light for opposing thousand pound cows and she is sensible enough to realize it.

As for bucking broncs—her experience has always been with thoroughbreds, fine and intelligent horses. She doesn't care to mix with the mean and unruly specimens of Texas horseflesh and has never made any brags of being a bucking horse rider.

Her friends say, however, that if she had to, she could probably make a very good ride on a tough bucking bronc. She is a wonderful straight rider and has such a knack of balance that it is hard to imagine her being thrown from even the most wildly gyrating saddle.

She's a real Texas range girl—and a pride to the Lone Star!

Before Dale knew what was going to happen, his lips were on hers

Girl With a Maverick Heart

By CYLVIA S. ELVAY

No cowboy could put his brand on lovely Dale Gardner—until a rash, drifting bronc buster seared her heart with a kiss!

IT WAS no job for a very pretty girl. Dale Gardner was thinking just how many people had told her that. She leaned listlessly against the shady side of the small ferry shack dressed in working clothes of denim trousers, red silk blouse, and a tan ten gallon hat. Her lovely hazel eyes followed a tall sun-tanned rider down the steep cliff-side trail to Trick River.

For an entire year now, Dale and her fourteen-year-old brother, Jimmy, had been ferrying horsemen across the rippling current between Texas and New Mexico. She had come to know a lot about men from watching the way they approached the landing.

Riders who forced their lathered broncs with quirt and spur down the rocky precipitous bluff could be counted on for a little trouble. It was unskilled horsemen who eyed her slim boyish figure with a sly grin, stared boldly at her luxuriant chestnut hair and clearly cut cameo features. They could be counted upon to invite her into the town of Tuckersville for a good time. But there was a safe answer for Dale as the ferry nudged the opposite river bank.

"No thank you," she would say pertly. "I'm already spoken for. Besides my brother and I are in a hurry to get back for the sheriff. Lead your horse off the barge, please. Your fare is fifty cents."

At that moment, young Jimmy would be standing near a double-barreled shotgun at the end of the flat-bottom ferry. He was big for his age and screwed down his features to look tough.

If that wasn't enough for the mashing passenger—if he asked the name of her fiancé, then Dale had another good answer.

"He's Curly Lambert, who won the State pistol shoot last year. He owns the big Bearclaw Ranch just over yonder bluff."

At the mention of "Curly" Lambert's well known name, the knowing riders buttoned their lips and rode on. Those strangers who didn't know Lambert's farflung reputation as a man who always got what he went after, also rode on. The bare mention of his pistol accuracy portended danger.

But this was all different when skilled horsemen like the tall sun-tanned rider approaching the river's edge made the crossing. These riders sat loosely in the saddle, hands resting on the kak pommel, allowing the bronc to pick his own way down the rocky trail.

"Howdy, ma'am," they usually greeted, and that was what this tall rider said—then added, "Would you mind carrying me an' Foolish across the wet?"

Dale smiled pleasantly at this rider, wondering how the pert-eyed sorrel had come by such a ridiculous name. Its owner wore working-puncher garb of warm bullhide chaps, checkered shirt, and a cracked Stetson. He removed the big hat to wipe perspiration from his brow with the back of a well tanned wrist. His eyes were clear blue and honest, his chin square and strong.

THE ivory-handled gun tied low to his thigh had seen a lot of use, but Dale doubted that he was a gunman.

"Be glad to take you over, cowboy," she smiled up at him. "If your bronc is spooky, you'll find a snubbing post at the side of the barge. And I have hobbles if you need them."

"Gosh, no, Miss!" the tall puncher smilingly exclaimed as he swung down from the saddle, and led his pony up the gangplank to the barge. "Hobbles would be plumb insulting to Foolish. Why he's got more savvy than most humans."

Jimmy cast off the gangplank. He thrust the ferry out into the current with a big pole. It was obvious that Jimmy cottoned to this stranger. The boy was all grins. As if he knew he wouldn't have to use his shotgun this trip.

As the flat-bottomed boat pushed into the stream, Dale could not help asking the question in her mind.

"If your pony is so smart, why do you call him Foolish?" she inquired.

The puncher dropped the reins of the beautiful sorrel, leaving the horse standing alone in the center of the ferry. He took a weary seat on the board side of the barge and frowned as he extracted a sack of Durham from his shirt pocket and with one hand rolled a cigarette.

"Well, it was this way, Miss," the cowboy started to explain in a slow drawl. "When Foolish was a young and inexperienced cayuse, he made one heap big mistake. He plumb fell in love with a chestnut haired, hazel eyed filly. But this beautiful filly was already spoken for by a big and ugly hammerhead with buck teeth and eyes like chunks of glass. That didn't cut no difference with Foolish. He just went right on ahead sparking this cute little filly."

"So then this big ugly hammerhead knocked the stuffing right out of Foolish. Which served him right for doing anything so silly as to try to cut another hombre out of his girl."

Dale's eyes flashed and she drew back haughtily. But she couldn't be certain whether this puncher was making sly fun of her. The cowboy's features were deadly serious as he lighted his quirly and blew out a stream of blue smoke.

Yet his description of the big horse that "knocked the stuffing out" of Foolish certainly fitted Curly Lambert. The rancher was not long on good looks and didn't have a great many friends in the Tuckerville country. He was a newcomer who had moved into free range with a big herd of stock.

When the owner of the Bearclaw Ranch vanished on the cattle trail to market, Curly Lambert had taken over the Bearclaw range. True, he had paid the widow of the dead ranch owner a sum of money for grazing rights but she moved away with her son and had never been heard from again.

That had all been six years ago, yet some folk still hinted that Curly Lambert hadn't paid Widow Stewart enough for the Bearclaw. Acquiring more and more land, he was well on his way to becoming the biggest rancher in the State. Which might have been why other ranchers were jealous. There was also talk that Curly Lambert was politically ambitious and might run for United States senator some day.

Dale Gardner threw back her head with pride for the puncher's yarn had fired her.

"Did you make up that horse story for my benefit?" she demanded. She noticed that Jimmy was grinning. He didn't like Curly.

"Gosh, no, lady!" the waddy exclaimed. "I don't go around making up stories about things I'm plumb fond of. I'm just a poor busted cowpoke looking for a grubline job. I'm real good at busting bad cayuses like that ugly hammerhead I told you about and I'm a roper good enough for most rodeos. I don't talk much, but I'm just powerful lonely for somebody to talk to. If there wasn't anybody around, then I'd talk to myself, although some people say that's crazy."

Dale stepped back, her hazel eyes still clouded with suspicion. Jimmy was still grinning, as if he had enjoyed everything the puncher said.

"Once you do start talking," Dale said shortly, "you manage to say a great deal, don't you?"

The stranger frowned dismally at the tip of his cigarette. The barge was now almost across the river. It slipped by pulleys along a steel cable, which held it from drifting downstream with the strong current. Jimmy cranked a wheel that pulled on the cable and hauled the ferry. It was not a difficult task to cross the river, but it took a little time.

"I didn't start all this talk, lady," the cowboy said. He blew out another cloud of smoke and cocked an eye at his sorrel, who was watching him as if amused.

"If you think I talk too much, then I'll shut up. I don't want people to be annoyed, although I don't often see the same people twice. Everybody calls me Drifter Jones because I don't stay in one place very long. I've been from Montana to the Mexican Border. I've even seen Omaha, where I went with a shipment of cattle once, but I had to ride the blinds back.

"Some day when I can get a girl who will marry me, I might take her to see New York. Maybe I can get a job with the rodeo they stage there every year. But first I better get a job around here, because I'm powerful hungry. Do you know anybody who needs a real good cowhand?"

Dale bit her lips. She couldn't be certain whether Drifter Jones was spoofing her. The strangest part was that he seemed very familiar to her, as if she had seen him some place before. In a rodeo or on the dusty streets of some Texas town. She didn't doubt that he had heard about her and the ferry. Travelers were said to tell the tale about the girl who warned passengers that she was engaged to a rancher with a fast gun.

"If you want a job, you'll have to find it for yourself," Dale said coolly. "I'm too busy to look for jobs for drifting cowpokes."

"Thanks a lot for telling me that, lady," Drifter said, his blue eyes lighting up. "That's good advice, just what my Dad used to say. And in those very same words. But I was hearing down the trail a bit, that an hombre called Curly Lambert lived in these parts, and how he needed somebody to break some real tough horses that he couldn't ride himself."

NOW Dale was furious for she knew this puncher had tricked her. He obviously had heard all about her and Curly and his story poked fun at their romance.

"Curly Lambert can ride any horse in the world!" she flared up.

"I bet he couldn't ride Foolish," Drifter Jones retorted easily. "Foolish won't let anybody but me get on him."

"Listen to me, Drifter," Dale said wrathfully as the ferry touched the New Mexican shore, "you owe me fifty cents. I don't want any more talk with you. I'm engaged to Curly Lambert. Now get off my boat!"

Drifter Jones ambled to his feet and took the reins of his sorrel. He swung a long leg upward and over the saddle cantle. He flipped his quirkly into the muddy stream.

"You shore must be dead in love with that curly wolf," he said casually.

"I'm not dead in love with any man!" Dale Gardner exploded, "I'm not that foolish. Hand me over fifty cents and mind your own business."

"That's all I'm wanting to mind," said Drifter, drawing a silver dollar out of his pocket, "but I ain't got any business right now. That's why I wanted to know where Curly Lambert lives, but you're scared to tell me. Maybe you think he'll try to ride Foolish and get hurt. That would make Curly plumb foolish, which you say you ain't about any man."

Dale was seething with anger and Jimmy was chuckling with glee. There didn't seem to be any way to get the better of this puncher. He took words right out of her mouth and twisted them. She had never met anybody like him before.

"Where's your ferry fare?" she demanded, striding forward, holding her hand up to the rider. Drifter showed even white teeth in his broad smile.

He leaned down to pay her. Leaned over slowly at first, and then with astonishing speed his head dropped. Before Dale knew what was going to happen, his lips were on hers, and there was a loud smack. She felt a silver dollar drop into her suddenly limp hand.

"Much obliged to a girl with a maverick heart," Drifter Jones laughed. "Keep the change for my trip back across the river case Curly don't hire me."

"Brute!" Dale cried out, drawing back her hand with the dollar and throwing the heavy coin at the cowboy.

Drifter's spur had tickled Foolish, and the horse was away with a leap. The silver dollar struck the animal's rump, fell tinkling to the floor of the ferry. Foolish went on down the gangplank that Jimmy had dropped, galloped across the shoreline and hit the bluff trail on the run. Drifter's amused laugh floated back to Dale's tingling, red ears.

Jimmy Gardner was doubled over with laughter, face red.

"That hombre certainly got under your skin, sis."

"And what did you do to help me?" Dale demanded irately. "I thought that you were some protection, but you're not. If he comes back here again, I'll run him off with the shotgun."

At the top of the cliff bluff, Drifter Jones had halted to wave an arm. Dale turned her head away. She didn't see Jimmy wave back. Dale's fingers inadvertently went to her lips. She wiped them angrily, to take away the warm imprint that Drifter had left there.

It was the first time that any rider had ever been able to steal a kiss from "the girl with the maverick heart," the name that many dusty passengers had given Dale Gardner. And Drifter had known that too.

There were not many kisses that she gave to Curly Lambert. When Dale had said she was not dead in love with any man, she had told the truth. She was marrying Curly some day in the future because she felt that she owed him a debt. Marriage was the only way that she could pay it off.

Dale's father had been killed the year before when the ferry cable broke during a bad storm. He was washed downstream and over the treacherous falls to a watery grave. Before that time, she had never thought much of Curly. But then he had come forward and offered to replace the ferry and the cable. He had learned that it was her father's ambition to send Jimmy to El Paso to continue the boy's schooling. Jimmy had the makings of a lawyer.

Curly had been very nice about his offer. "Now that your father is gone, Dale," he had said, "and your mother died years ago, you have to be both father and mother to Jimmy. This ferry is a paying proposition. You can save almost a thousand dollars a year with Jimmy helping you in running it. I don't want strangers coming in close to my range, charging me crossing money for my horses."

"I'll fix up the ferry, but you won't use it in high water. And you can give me free crossing for interest on the debt. That's a fair business proposition."

"That's awfully fine of you, Curly," Dale had replied as they sat at dinner in the hotel in Tuckersville. "I know Jimmy would like it. Poor father would want me to send Jimmy to school. He sent me away to school for two years. That's why no money was left when he died."

Curly's hand had stolen across the table, his long lean fingers wrapping about her wrist possessively.

"And that isn't all, Dale," Curly had said. "I know you're in mourning now, so I won't say anything, but you're different from most girls I've met. You'll make a fine wife for an ambitious man some day."

Dale had withdrawn her hand. She had always regarded Curly as much too old for her. He was an ambitious man and had a lot to offer a girl. But not real love. He was too selfish, a hard and ruthless driver, with many enemies. No one knew from where he had come, or what his background had been. Everybody, however, knew where he was going.

Six months after her father's death, Curly began riding over to the Gardner cabin once a week to call on Dale and Jimmy. Curly was not a moonlight rider when it came to romance. He would just sit and talk about his ranch and the plans he had for it. Dale always fixed him up a big supper, which he enjoyed.

"When are you going to marry me, Dale?" Curly had asked one night. "You get on well with people. You'd make a good wife for a United States senator. I'm going into politics this year and I'll be very busy, but after it's over, we could get married."

CURLY had never kissed her up to that point. He got out of his chair and came around the table. Jimmy happened to be in Tuckersville that evening visiting school friends. Dale's heart had caught in her throat. She knew she didn't love Curly Lambert. But she felt that she had led him on.

When he lowered his head to kiss her lips, she was trembling with an unknown fear. She hoped he wouldn't draw her up from the table in his arms, and Curly didn't. She tried to be responsive to his caress, but she couldn't. Curly had seemed satisfied though. He was so sure of himself—too sure.

He laughed after he had lightly brushed her lips with his mouth.

"The girl with the maverick heart," Curly had said. "But when I put my brand on it, all will be different."

It had been the first time Dale Gardner heard the term. She mentioned it to Jimmy when he came home and Curly had left. Jimmy admitted that the punchers were saying she was a maverick that no puncher could rope. It was not an insult. It was said in good fun, but the way Curly Lambert had said it made it a challenge. There was a difference now.

Though she knew that most of her passengers on the ferry referred to her as the girl with the maverick heart, it never bothered her until Drifter Jones had stolen a kiss and rode off the ferry.

After Drifter's departure they made the ferry fast to the New Mexican bank. Dusk was closing in and winter rains had swollen the river making dusk crossings very dangerous. After fastening extra mooring lines to the ferry, they left for supper.

The sun was getting ready to set in a great sea of gold as they climbed the bluff and crossed the deep sagebrush to a clean and stout cabin. Jimmy went into the cabin to prepare the fire for supper and Dale watched the pink flush creeping across the limitless skies. It was a wistful hour. Her eyes went across the rolling range to where she could see whitefaced cattle grazing. These steers belonged to Curly Lambert.

"I wonder if he got a job?" Dale asked herself, and she was surprised that she was thinking of Drifter Jones. Her hand rose to her lips.

Curly was expected to call later that night. When Dale went into the cabin to prepare the evening meal, Jimmy asked her if she wanted him to saddle his pony and ride to town.

"Why, Jimmy?" Dale asked boldly.

"Well, I thought mebbe you'd like to talk with Curly alone," the boy answered. "I don't want to be in the way of an engaged couple."

"You're not in the way, Jimmy," Dale frowned. That was all she said—all she could bring herself to say.

The moon was riding a clear sky when Curly Lambert's horse loped up to the cabin. Dale and Jimmy could hear his spurs coming to the door. Curly knocked and walked in without being bidden.

"Hello, Dale," he said in a good humor. "How are you, Jimmy?"

There was no kiss.

"How's everything, Curly?" Dale asked with a forced smile.

"I'm doing my homework," Jimmy said, frowning at his book.

Curly sat down at the table, pulled off his big black hat and sent it skimming onto a chair.

"Everything is going along fine, Dale," the big rancher said. "I've got things fixed to run in the primary election this Summer. It's going to cost a lot of money, but I'm sure to win the nomination, and that means election. Yes, everything is going fine, Dale, for you and me."

"I had a good piece of luck this afternoon too. A bronc stomper rode in and offered to tackle that wild string of cayuses I picked up cheap last month. He'll break them for nine dollars a head, a dollar below the regular price."

Dale took a seat at the table, an unac-countable chill running down her spine.

Jimmy looked up.

"Why didn't you give him ten bucks a head?" the boy asked. "He might get hurt or even killed."

"He was broke." Curly laughed. "That's how I beat him down. But he won't get hurt. He took the bucking horse championship at El Paso last year. And besides, those fools don't know any better."

Fools! Drifter was a wanderer but no fool. Dale bit her lips in chagrin wondering why it hurt her to hear an unknown cowboy referred to as a fool.

"I'm glad to hear of your election promises, Curly," she said to change the subject.

Curly reached across the table, taking her hand, despite the fact that Jimmy was there. His face was florid.

"I was thinking we might be married after I get the nomination, Dale. It would make things look good. Women would like it. They'd all vote for a groom. How about it?"

Something rose up in Dale's throat. Her marriage would be a sacred thing and not something to be used as a pawn in politics. She was willing to make a great sacrifice for Jimmy, but not a sacrifice such that she would hate herself for the rest of her life. She rose slowly from the table, jerking her hand away from Curly Lambert.

Suddenly she realized he was distasteful to her.

"Under those conditions there will be no marriage. Before the election or after, Mr. Curly Lambert!" Dale cried. "I'm not marrying any man for a position that he is going to get. You might as well know that right now."

"Don't get sore, honey," Curly remonstrated, jumping to his feet. "You're going to be my wife and you should want to help me get ahead. I thought you might like playing that little game with me."

"I don't like playing games that are not completely honest," Dale snapped back.

"Gosh! This is developing into a regular lovers' quarrel," Curly chuckled. "I better get out. You just think things over real carefully, Dale. Perhaps you'll see things my way, like you always do. It sure takes me a lot of slow and easy work to put my brand on your heart."

"That's because a true maverick wears no man's brand," Dale replied swiftly. "You had better go now or I might say something you won't like."

JIMMY looked up from his school book. His dislike of the scene was evident in his face.

"That's my advice, Curly," the boy said. "Sis is in a bad mood tonight. She's been snapping at me too. It's because Drifter Jones kissed her on the ferry this afternoon."

"What's that!" Curly Lambert cried. His face darkened with rage, his fists clenched. "That bronc stomper kissed you, Dale?"

Dale stepped back, her head held high, her eyes flashing.

"I never dreamed that Jimmy would tattle-tale like that, but now that he has I won't deny it." She flashed an angry look at her brother.

"Drifter was just kidding," Jimmy hastily put in. "He only stole a kiss, just like any puncher would do if he saw a pretty girl."

"And what did you do, Dale?" Curly Lambert demanded, hunching his shoulders and stepping around the table. "Were you flirting with him? How did you let such a thing happen if you didn't ask for it? Answer me."

Jimmy got up from his desk and moved to a corner where the double-barreled shotgun leaned against the wall.

"Aw, forget it, Curly," said the boy. "It wasn't anything. Dale wasn't flirting with the stranger. He just leaned down from the saddle and took a peck when she was reaching for his ferry fare."

"You shut your little trap," Curly Lambert snarled. "Dale will answer to me. She's going to be my wife. I thought she never let any man but me kiss her. And mighty few opportunities do I get. I want to know the truth. I'll gun that saddle tramp down when I get back to the ranch."

"And lose your election," Dale laughed mirthlessly. "What's more, Mr. Curly Lambert, I'll have you know that I will kiss anybody I want, and it isn't any of your business. You won't ever come into this cabin again unless you apologize here and now for your tone of voice."

"Me apologize!" Curly exclaimed in amazement. "Why it's up to you to beg forgiveness for letting that tramp—"

"It will be a long time before I beg forgiveness from any man," Dale Gardner replied coldly. "Now, go home before you put your foot in deeper than it already is."

Curly Lambert trembled with rage. He cast a glance at Jimmy over in the corner of the cabin, then stared long and hard at Dale. With a shrug, he turned to the door.

"Just a maverick," Curly said under his breath, and went out.

Dale and Jimmy heard the rancher's horse squeal under the bite of spurs as Curly Lambert rode off.

Dale looked at her brother.

"Why did you tell him?" she demanded. "You don't like him, do you? You have wanted to break this up for a long time. You really hate Curly Lambert, but do you know why I said I would marry him? It was all for you. I wanted you to be able to go to school—"

"That's why I told him," Jimmy said, grinning. "Because I don't want Curly Lambert for no brother-in-law. I'd rather run the ferry for the rest of my life than put up with him."

Dale slowly sat down at the table. Suddenly her anger was gone. A great burden seemed to lift from her heart. She felt free once more. It was something that she had wanted for a long time and didn't really know it. Once more, she was a complete maverick, wearing no man's brand. She hadn't lost Curly Lambert. He'd come back. But she didn't want him.

Then a new fear assailed her. Her face went white.

"What will he do to Drifter?" She asked Jimmy.

"Something tells me that Drifter can take care of himself," her brother smiled and turned to his book. "Don't bother me, Dale. I've got a book from Judge Hobart about law that I want to read. He says I could take a correspondence course, and he'll help me pass the State exams."

"Jimmy!" Dale cried with joy and ran across the room to hug him. "But I'm worried about Drifter. Curly might do something. If that puncher is killed, it will be my fault. I never should have started talking to him."

"Don't worry about Drifter Jones," Jimmy advised her. "But if you want me to slip out to the Bearclaw bunkhouse, wake Drifter up and warn him, I'll do it."

"Please, Jimmy," Dale pleaded. "There's no other way."

"All right, sis, but I'm going to tell him you sent me."

"No, Jimmy. I hate that man. He's the one that caused all the trouble."

"I wouldn't call it trouble," said Jimmy as he went out the door.

Going to bed was out of the question for Dale. She tried to read a book, but her mind was on Jimmy's trip. A hundred times she told herself that the bronc stomper's troubles were not her concern. She certainly wasn't in love with the man. He was footloose and irresponsible.

Then she remembered that Curly had said Drifter Jones had won a rodeo contest. Drifter himself had said he might get a job with the rodeo in New York. The puncher was not a complete liar. He put just enough truth into his stories to avoid absolute falsehood.

In her mind, Dale could see Drifter sitting on the side of the barge, rolling his cigarette, his lean tanned features deadly serious as he told the story about Foolish. There was no doubt now that he had been talking about her and Curly Lambert. Dale was the filly engaged to Curly, a big ugly hammerhead. But Dale had never seen Drifter before—or had she?

Had he crossed the ferry when her father was running it, and noticed her when she hadn't noticed him? She couldn't be sure.

IT WAS almost midnight before the boy opened the cabin door. He halted, looking at Dale sitting in a rocking chair by a lamp, an unopened book in her hands. Jimmy grinned.

"I found where Drifter was sleeping and woke him up. I told him about Curly."

"Curly didn't do anything to him then?" Dale asked.

"Nope," Jimmy replied. "I reckon Curly went to town for some drinks. I spent a lot of time talking with Drifter out near the corral. Curly came home and went into the ranchhouse to bed. Drifter and I talked some more, then I came home."

"Did Drifter leave the ranch?" Dale asked breathlessly.

"No, he's going to stay and break those broncs for Curly," Jimmy answered.

"But he can't!" Dale protested. "He will get killed."

"He says he most likely takes after his horse," Jimmy said with a grin. "He can't help trying to cut another man out of his girl. Curly will just have to knock the stuffing out of him."

Dale stiffened in the chair.

"I won't allow it!" she exclaimed. "He's just acting foolish to make an impression on me."

"That's what he says," Jimmy said. "He says he's just plumb foolish."

Dale threw her book at Jimmy. He ducked and ran laughing out of the room.

"Jimmy!" Dale cried. "We both are going over to the Bearclaw tomorrow and stop this trouble. I won't have any man hurt on my account."

Jimmy didn't answer.

That night, as Dale lay in her bunk, she made her plans. She believed she was solely responsible for the danger that confronted two men. She remembered the six-gun tied low to Drifter's leg. She didn't doubt that he was as fast with a weapon as he was skilled with a horse. No wonder he was not afraid of Curly Lambert.

But Curly was conceited and thought he could handle anyone. He was faster than most men on this range with a gun.

If an argument started, one man would die. His blood would be on Dale's hands. She had to stop the fight as best she could. Even with a woman's wiles if necessary. She could not let Drifter get hurt. As for Curly, well . . .

Her dreams that night were filled with nightmares of fighting men and bucking horses. She was on a ferry in a raging storm, in which she was dashed upon rocks below a treacherous waterfall.

In the morning, Dale awoke with a start. Jimmy was already up and had the coffee boiling. Instead of denims, Dale took a fringed buckskin suit out of a closet. It was her father's last Christmas present to her. She drew on her best boots, and about her waist she buckled a cartridge belt, to which was attached a hand-carved holster. Into this casing she thrust her .32 caliber pearl-handled revolver.

Dale was primed for whatever might come, with beauty and bullets.

"Come an' git it!" Jimmy shouted through the door. When Dale came in, he was surprised. "Gee, sis, you look like you were going to Stampede Day!"

"I'm going to stampede Drifter Jones off his range," Dale said stoutly.

"Something tells me he doesn't run away," Jimmy remarked, breaking eggs in the frying pan. "Last night he said he sure liked it around here. Asked me how Dad got killed and how Curly Lambert managed to buy the Bearclaw Ranch from old Widow Stewart. I think Drifter knows more about this neck of the woods than he's telling."

Dale's eyes widened in curiosity.

"I have a feeling I've seen him some place before, Jimmy," she said. "He could have worked around here before joining the rodeo circuit."

"Wouldn't be a bit surprised," Jimmy replied. "Here are your eggs, sis. Eat hearty. Something tells me this is going to be a tough day."

"Something is always telling you something," Dale remarked, frowning. "You're getting too big for your hat. So I'm telling you right now that you are not taking that shotgun with you. I'll handle both Curly Lambert and Drifter Jones and I won't need any help from a button like you."

Jimmy grinned and said nothing.

The trail to the Bearclaw led across beautiful rolling range, knee-deep in buffalo grass. In the distance, herd after herd of Curly Lambert's whitefaced cattle were eating themselves fat for market. In the past, hoof-and-mouth disease had taken a terrible toll of stock. But now, with improved breeding methods and serum injections, there was a fortune being made on this range. And Curly was getting more than his share of it.

Dale's memory went back to the former owner of the Bearclaw Ranch, dead six years. Dale had been only eleven when Bob Stewart vanished while taking a herd to the railroad junction. She remembered that it was a year of drought. Money was scarce, and Mrs. Stewart had been left helpless with her fourteen-year-old son. She had been forced to accept Curly Lambert's cheap offer to buy the Bearclaw. Then she had moved away, taking her young son with her.

Dale being taught by her mother, had never gone to the Tuckerville school and met young Bob Stewart. She remembered Mr. Stewart and his family crossing the river on the ferry operated by her father. But at that time, the Stewart button had been too busy with affairs of his own to be bothered with girls.

AS DALE and Jimmy came within sight of the Bearclaw ranchhouse and out-buildings, she couldn't help but realize that all this wealth and luxury would be hers if she surrendered her heart to Curly Lambert. If she didn't, what had the world to offer her? She might continue running the ferry for the rest of her life. Or she might marry a poverty-stricken puncher.

"Jimmy, I'm afraid," Dale told her brother as their ponies turned off the main road toward the Bearclaw headquarters.

Jimmy's eyes were on a corral below the big red-painted barn.

"There's men in the saddling chute!"

Jimmy cried. "I can see Drifter climbing up the rails. Curly is there. Come on, sis!"

Jimmy's spurs went to the flanks of his pinto, and the boy left Dale on the gallop. She applied quirt to the rump of her buckskin pony. The shrill cry of a wild cayuse fighting the tightening cinch of a saddle came to her ears. She could see Drifter easing himself onto the hull of a big black cayuse, penned between the sides of the bucking chute.

Before Dale reached the corral, the gate of the chute was jerked open, and the bucking horse with Drifter Jones aboard sprang into the center of the pen.

Curly Lambert saw Dale Gardner, jumped down from the corral rails and started toward her.

"What are you doing here, Dale?" he demanded. "Leave at once!"

Dale drew her buckskin pony to a stiff-legged halt, and she swung down from the saddle.

"I have no intention of going away, Curly," she said, walking forward. "Not until Drifter Jones leaves. If I made any trouble between you two men, I am here to see that it is patched up before it hurts both of you—"

She broke off as the wild bronc in the corral screamed with rage. The pounding of the animal's hoofs caused even Curly Lambert to turn. Now the bucking horse went into a crazy spinning motion. Drifter Jones was riding the animal with the expert skill of a champion. But the bronc was the kind of an animal that no rodeo official would ever allow in the ring.

It was a mad spinner, a cayuse that didn't sunfish and buck-jump like other bucking horses, but a horse that went around like a top, swapping ends and hammering at the earth with all four legs at the same time.

No man could sit such a horse for long. No man could even break such a critter. The horse was a killer, Dale knew. And she knew too, that this was Curly's revenge on Drifter for the stolen kiss.

"Get off him, Drifter!" young Jimmy Gardner shouted. "You don't stand a chance."

Dale raced for the corral rails, but Curly Lambert caught her, and pulled her away. She slapped at his restraining arms.

"Get on your pony and clear out of here, Dale!" Curly shouted. "This is man's work. That bronc stomper contracted with me for the work, and he'll have to work what I give him."

"That horse is loco!" Dale raged, furious at Curly's snide trick of revenge. "It should be shot!"

The spinning cayuse struck hard into the off side of the corral with its rump. Like breaking icicles, the poles gave way, and the horse went floundering through. Drifter was hurled from the saddle like a stone from a sling. He yelled in alarm as his arms spread out and his hat came off. He struck the ground hard, his chin plowing up the dirt. He didn't get up but lay there, as if dead.

The crazed horse stumbled through the broken rails, fell, picked itself up. The saddle cinch had popped, and the kak was trampled free under the animal's hoofs. With a wild leap, the shrilling horse darted away, straight toward Drifter Jones' tall form prostrate on the hard ground.

Dale shut her eyes as she clung to the rails beside her brother. A shot blasted out beside her. Jimmy had fired. Dale jumped with surprise for she knew Jimmy owned no pistol. She opened her eyes and saw the animal leaping over Drifter's inert form.

Jimmy's shot had frightened the animal from jumping on the bronc stomper. The horse ran through the ranch yard and out to the open range screaming in its madness as the rope from its halter streamed along in the dirt.

"Thank goodness, he's not hurt!" Dale gasped as Drifter Jones slowly got to his feet.

"Good work, Drifter!" Jimmy sang out. A six-shooter dangled from his hand. "If you had made a move, that cayuse would have sure jumped you. You're a good actor!"

Drifter turned to look at Jimmy.

"Thanks for firing that shot, partner, it scared that bronc out of here."

Curly Lambert strode around the corral to confront Drifter.

"You're fired!" Curly shouted wrathfully. "You told me you could ride any bucking horse in the world. Get your horse and ride before I put a bullet in your hide."

Drifter picked up his hat and beat the dust out of it. His blue eyes turned toward Dale Gardner, and he grinned sheepishly. Then he looked back at Curly, who had a hand on his holstered six-gun. Drifter walked over to Jimmy and held out his hand for the weapon in the boy's hand.

"I'll be needing that extra hawg leg now, pard," Drifter said to Jimmy. "It's a good thing I loaned it to you last night."

"Keep your hand away from that six-gun!" Curly Lambert shouted, jerking his own weapon from its holster.

But Drifter Jones was too fast for the rancher. He snatched the six-gun from Jimmy's hand, and ducked low to the earth. Drifter's thumb flipped back the firing hammer of his gun. The muzzle spewed flame a yard long. The bullet smashed into the weapon that Curly Lambert had pulled, and was ripped from the rancher's hand.

"Now just stand hitched there, Lambert, with your arms raised," Drifter Jones said coolly, his lips turned in a hard grin. "That horse I just forked was more than loco crazy. It was drugged. I want to see if you didn't tuck a hollow needle under the saddle blanket."

Curly Lambert started moving backward towards Dale Gardner. The rancher's face was white with rage and terror.

"Get off this range!" Curly yelled. "I'll call my boys in from the pasture to shoot you!"

DRIFTER moved over to the fallen saddle, kneeling and cast an eye at the saddle blanket. His eyes left Curly Lambert for a moment. The big rancher grabbed Dale Gardner and thrust her before him as a shield. At the same time, Curly snatched the pearl-handled .32 from Dale's holster.

"Watch out, Drifter!" Dale shouted.

She whirled, struggling with Curly Lambert. The rancher let fire at Drifter, but Dale threw his aim off and the bullet went wild. As the rancher tried to hold her still, she got her arms free and beat her fists into his ugly face.

Jimmy jumped into the fray with a savage yell. He grabbed at Curly's gun arm. The rancher swung his gun gripping fist into the boy's face, knocking him to the ground.

Curly brought up the little gun trying to get in another shot at Drifter. Dale fought like a wildcat as Drifter came in on the run. Curly flung Dale away from him to confront the bronc stomper.

Drifter swung his six-gun barrel down across the rancher's wrist, knocking the .32 caliber weapon from his hand. Then he swung his left fist into Curly's jaw. The blow knocked the rancher backwards. His eyes rolled white as he hit the earth on his back, completely out.

There was a shout from the bull pasture. Dale turned her head. Several Bearclaw punchers were running toward the ranch yard, guns in their hands. Two of the weapons blasted, driving shots over the heads of Dale, Drifter, and Jimmy.

"We better get out of here," Drifter said, throwing up his weapon and shooting back at the Bearclaw waddies. "Jimmy, take care of Dale. Foolish is tied on the other side of the corral. I want that poisoned saddle."

Dale snatched up her pearl-handled gun near Curly's unconscious figure. The rancher breathed hoarsely, mouth open, teeth bared. He looked exactly like a big ugly hammer-head with his buck teeth and snake eyes. Dale breathed a sigh of relief that he was out of her life.

Jimmy brought up her buckskin. Dale mounted, watching the Bearclaw punchers racing toward their broncs in the pasture. Drifter paced up on Foolish, the suspicious saddle in his arms.

"Go ahead fast, Dale," he said. "I'll stay back to keep them from getting within shooting distance. I reckon I better take the ferry across the river until things calm down."

It was the first time the bronc stomper had called Dale by name. A thrill ran through her and it seemed that she had known him for a long time. She put spurs to her buckskin, dashed down the trail to the county road, Jimmy right behind her. Drifter followed, with his six-gun bared as he turned to look back.

Dale, Jimmy, and Drifter rode hard for two miles without incident. Then, far behind them, they saw riders appear on a hill. In the clear atmosphere of morning, they recognized Curly Lambert by his black hat and calfskin vest. The sunlight flashed on a rifle barrel. He meant to pursue them hard.

It was a race now to the bluff of Trick River. For a moment, Dale wondered why she was fleeing. She knew that neither she nor Jimmy had anything to fear from Curly Lambert. The rancher was obviously after Drifter Jones. She looked back at the tall bronc buster and was conscious then of reason enough. His fight was her fight. Again she felt that the slim puncher was part of her life—or had been.

Curly's pursuit meant one thing. He was after the saddle that Drifter carried. If a hollow needle loaded with drugs was found in the saddle blanket it would convict Curly of intent to murder. And it would certainly ruin his chances for the United States Senate, even if he managed to break the charge of drugging the range bronc. The entire cow country would despise him. And the pursuit proved his guilt, Dale knew.

The Bearclaw outfit gained a mile on the fleeing trio of riders, but they reached the bluff of Trick River with enough time to spare. Dale sent her buckskin down the steep trail to the water's edge, with Jimmy and Drifter following. They dismounted and led the three mounts aboard the ferry. The gang-plank was cast off. Drifter pushed the barge out into the current. Jimmy ran to the crank.

"We're safe for a time now," Drifter said, grinning at Dale. "I reckon I can thank you, ma'am, from the bottom of my heart. It was a plumb foolish thing for me to rile the curly wolf. Guess I'll never learn."

Dale's eyes flashed.

"Now, don't start all that silly talk again," she said. "I had enough yesterday. You don't fool me one wit. You planned all this. What's more, I know that Jimmy helped you."

Jimmy grinned at her as he hastily turned the big crank that drew on the steel cable stretching from one bank of the river to the other. The barge was making slow speed. Drifter constantly watched the high bluff of the New Mexican side of the river.

"I ain't denying that Jimmy was a big help," Drifter said, his lean tanned face deadly serious. "But we didn't know if we could count on you, ma'am. We couldn't be sure whether you really were in love with that big, ugly, hammerheaded bronc."

"Stop calling me ma'am," Dale said, stamping her foot. "I'm not in love with any man."

"How about me?" Drifter asked coolly.

Dale stepped back in amazement.

"You!" she gasped. "What ever in the world made you think that I had the slightest interest in you. Why, you are nothing but a foot-loose drifter, a nobody, a common maverick cow hand."

Drifter walked over to Dale. She held her ground, her heart beating furiously.

"An' you're the girl with the maverick heart," the bronc stomper said with a smile. "That makes both of us wild and free as the wind."

His arms reached out. Dale ducked, but was caught. Drifter drew her struggling to him. His lips suddenly were upon her mouth.

She cried out, but he stilled her protests. Then Dale knew that her struggles were really nothing but acting. A strange sweetness pervaded her heart.

As Drifter gently released her, she heard the crash of a rifle. Her eyes went to the New Mexican side of the river. The Bearclaw punchers were dashing down the bluff trail, Curly Lambert in the lead. The rancher threw a rifle to his shoulder and fired again. The bullet sang treacherously over the heads of Drifter and Dale.

"Get down behind the sides!" Drifter cried. "I never thought that coyote would shoot at a woman."

The ferry was just past the middle of the river, where the current raced strongest. Jimmy had to keep working the handle of the wheel to keep the barge moving. Drifter ran to the rear end and thumbed two shots back across the river at the Bearclaw hands. The range was long for a six-gun.

Dale watched breathlessly as Curly Lambert jumped from his saddle, ran to the big tool box beside the landing. He lifted the lid of the box and brought out an axe.

"He's going to cut the cable!" Dale cried.

"That's something else he'll have to answer for!" Drifter Jones gritted.

Dale saw Curly strike at the cable anchorage with the axe. Her eyes went downstream to the bend in the river. A half a mile beyond was the falls, where her father had met his death. She remembered that the ferry cable had been torn loose from the New Mexican side of the river the night in which her father had died.

It had been a mystery how such a thing could have happened. But no man had suspected foul play. Yet now as Curly Lambert cut through the steel cable with the axe, Dale remembered that her father and Curly had not been on good terms. Mr. Gardner had always thought that Curly ousted Mrs. Stewart and her son from the Bearclaw with threats. And there had been cattle rustling before that happened. Then the deadly truth smote her. "Drifter!" Dale cried. "He's a murderer too!"

"No doubt about it," Drifter Jones replied coldly. "But we've got him licked."

The cable snapped, went limp. Drifter, quick as a big cat, leaped to catch the slack in the wire. Working furiously, he managed to draw in enough to throw two looping half hitches around the snubbing post at the side of the barge.

The hitches held the ferry from slipping off the cable and plunging downstream over the deadly falls. The end of the cable attached to the Texas shore held. The barge floated swiftly in the current, describing a great arc as it was swept downstream and in toward the eastern shoreline.

Again Curly Lambert's rifle opened up. Drifter fired back with his six-gun.

A scream echoed across the water.

They saw Curly Lambert stiffen and fall across the gangplank left on the shore. Several of his punchers leaped to his body. They didn't pick him up. They turned to look at Drifter Jones, shook their fists. Drifter fired again, his bullet wide. The Bearclaw hands leaped aboard their broncs and rode up the steep bluff trail, leaving Curly Lambert's body behind them.

"They won't get far," Drifter chuckled.

"Why?" Dale asked.

The bronc stomper pointed at the bluff on the New Mexican shore. A band of horsemen had come into view. The sunlight sparkled on one of the riders and Dale recognized he was the sheriff from Tuckersville.

"He was almost too late, Drifter!" Jimmy Gardner cried out. "Look at the shooting."

The sheriff's posse were blasting away at the Bearclaw waddies as they streamed up the cliff trail. For a few moments there was rapid gunplay, but the Bearclaw cowboys were outnumbered. They threw down their guns and raised their hands.

"I reckon that's the end of a rustling hombre that almost got away with murder," Drifter Jones said, walking over to stand beside Dale Gardner. "Too bad Curly didn't live to hang."

Dale looked up into Drifter's eyes.

"Who are you, Drifter?" she asked. "I know that you've been here before. I feel that there's a great deal between you and Jimmy.

You know too much about everything."

"He's Bob Stewart," Jimmy Gardner called. "We've been thinking all along that you'd discover that, Dale."

"Bob Stewart!" Dale exclaimed. "Then you are the boy who went away with your mother—"

"And hit the trail to find out what happened to my father when he went to market with a herd," Drifter Jones answered, taking Dale's hands. "It took me two years to find his bones, where rustlers murdered him. And it took me three more years to discover that Curly Lambert had been behind the deal. I laid my plans accordingly. I've been around here a long time, Dale, searching for the proof I needed. Jimmy helped me a lot. So you see we're not such strangers after all, Dale."

"Drifter," Dale asked anxiously, "do you think Curly cut the cable the night that father was killed?"

"I don't doubt it, Dale," the bronc stomper answered. "I spent days trying to find the cable in the falls, but it was no use. Let us talk about something more pleasant. I've got a heap to say."

The ferry had gradually swung against the shore. Jimmy was getting boards for a gangplank for the horses. The boy was whistling quietly, as if he heard nothing.

Dale lifted her face to the tall sun-tanned puncher, her heart soaring.

"I'm just foolish enough to listen to you, Drifter Jones," she said.

"Shucks," Drifter Jones, alias Bob Stewart, replied. "I can think of better things to do than a lot of foolish talking!"

He took the girl with the maverick heart into his arms. Dale felt a sweet contentedness sweep over her. She was no longer a free, wild girl of the plains. Drifter's kiss seared into her soul like a flaming brand.

Can't Keep Grandma In Her Chair

She's as Lively as a Youngster—Now her Backache is better

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. Doan's give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

(Ad.)

Abruptly, Lee caught Janet in his arms

Pixie of Pinon Canyon

By N. C. RALEIGH

Charming Janet Lyle is wise in the ways of the rangeland, but doesn't know how to compete with a glamorous, artful siren!

JANET walked out to the shelf of rock where one lone pine stood guard. Sitting down on the sun-warmed stone, she rested her pointed chin on her knees, letting the pine-fragrant breeze fling her short brown curls all over her head. She never heard the muted sound of approaching footsteps on the thick mat of pine needles, the quick indrawn breath of the young rancher who stopped at the fringe of junipers.

She might have been a forest sprite—with her green sweater cut from the velvety moss at the foot of the giant pines, and her riding skirt and boots fashioned of brown bark.

"Howdy, miss," the rancher called softly, as though the graceful green-and-brown figure might vanish at the sound of a human voice.

Startled, Janet sprang up to face him. Her swift glance took in the more than six feet of lithe, blue-jeaned cowboy standing with his wide hat in one hand. His brown eyes were warm and friendly, and the dappling sun chased shadows and lights over his smooth dark head. An answering smile curved her red lips.

"Howdy," she replied to his greeting.

He came toward her, walking lightly with his high-heeled boots, on the slippery needles.

"So you are real. I'd have sworn you were some kind of fairy," he admitted. Then he asked eagerly, "Didn't I see the Toppling R brand on your horse back there?"

She nodded and the eagerness sparked brighter in his dark eyes. He was quite close to her now and she could see the clear, healthy look of his bronze skin, the whiteness of his teeth. Her smile grew warmer. There were no men in all the world like the ranchers of the Sierra Negra country, she thought, with the glow of homecoming intensified.

"Then you're Thalia Mathews?" the cowboy was asking, with that eagerness warm as a handclasp in his voice and eyes.

Janet's bright smile faded. So he'd already heard of Thalia, with her blond beauty and her way of capturing any man's heart.

"No, I'm Janet Lyle. I—I work for Miss Mathews."

He couldn't hide the disappointment that flashed through his eyes.

"I was hoping—I've been anxious to meet her," he remarked. "Well, I guess that can come later." He grinned down at Janet. "I still think you're some kind of elf. Are you a stranger to the Sierra Negra country?"

"Hardly. I lived on the other side of the mountains all my childhood," Janet explained.

She was no fairy, but she certainly had a sensation of being bewitched—and liking it. Suddenly it seemed the most natural thing in the world to sit beside Lee Carlton of the LC Connected, and confide that she'd spent the last two years in the city with her aunt and uncle, after her ranch home had been sold when her grandfather died. And how she'd come to work for Thalia Mathews as companion-secretary when the Eastern girl inherited the Toppling R.

Lee shared the sense of enchantment. She could tell by the glow in his eyes, the vibrant huskiness of his voice.

"Janet, dear!" came a lilting call. "I've been looking everywhere for you. I was getting so worried."

There was reproof in the dulcet tones, and Janet, watching Thalia ride out of the thicket had to bite back the annoyance she felt. She was acutely conscious of Lee standing beside her, his attention now focused on the vivid blond girl who made such a dramatic picture against the dark green of the forest.

With more than cordial interest, Thalia let her wide blue gaze rest on Lee as Janet unhappily explained that he was the owner of the ranch adjoining the Toppling R. Thalia graciously allowed Lee to hand her down from the saddle.

She declared with a dazzling smile that it was just too wonderful to have a neighbor like Lee, and there were dozens of things she'd have to ask him about the country and cattle ranching. She managed to appear small and helpless and fragile, though she was a good four inches taller than Janet, and anything but helpless.

"Janet, darling," Thalia suggested gently, "had you forgotten the calf registrations?"

For a split second Janet looked blank. She actually opened her lips to remind Thalia that the registrations weren't due till next week. Then she caught a warning flash of the blue eyes. Janet shut her teeth tight with a little click, nodded her farewell to Lee, and marched over to her pony.

The cowboy's eager voice followed her.

"I've sure been wanting to meet you, Miss Mathews."

Well, you've met her, thought Janet bitterly, riding down the winding, pine-bordered trail. You've met the gorgeous, irresistible Thalia Mathews, and she'll have your handsome scalp dangling from her belt in less time than it takes you to hogtie a yearling, Mr. Lee Carlton. Meantime she's my boss and she'll not let me or anyone else forget it for a split second.

As for her, she'd better completely forget one tall, dark-eyed rancher with a warm grin, and a disturbing huskiness in his deep voice. But her eyes sparkled indignantly and there was a defiant quirk to her curved red lips.

THE next day Thalia decided that she and Janet had better ride back up in the mountains again.

"Lee seems to be interested in buying a piece of my land," she explained. Her knowing blue eyes added that if that was his excuse for seeking her company, she'd humor him. "This is the canyon ahead here—Piñon Canyon."

Janet had no desire to discuss Lee Carlton with Thalia.

"There's a good crop of piñon nuts this year," she observed noncommittally.

They rounded a spur of the mountain, and broke suddenly into a lovely little meadow cut by a tumbling mountain stream.

"What on earth?" Thalia demanded, as her eyes encompassed the campfire, and a three-sided brush shelter. Farther on she could see several hobbled ponies and a scattering of full-skirted women and black-haired children.

"Navajos," Janet explained, smiling in recognition. "They're gathering piñon nuts. We always had them for a week or so this time of year."

"Well, I'm certainly not having them on my land," Thalia declared, and promptly urged her pony forward.

"They're harmless, really," Janet protested hastily. "Everyone lets them camp—"

"I'm not everyone," Thalia retorted, blue eyes flashing angrily.

They were at the edge of the camp and had slowed the horses to a walk when a lean black cat darted across the trail. Thalia screamed and jerked her pony sharply to the side, but the cat went on its way, slinking into the brush like an inky shadow.

Janet wanted to laugh but she didn't dare. She knew how seriously Thalia took her pet superstitions. The blond girl had turned pale, and her eyes were narrowed with anger.

"Get off my hand!" she ordered furiously, pulling her pony to a prancing halt before the staring Indians. "You understand what I'm saying, all right. You're trespassing. Pick up your stuff and move, right now! Pronto!"

The Navajo women stared at her impassively.

"Who's the head of this tribe?" Thalia demanded.

A wrinkled old squaw came from the shelter. There was deliberate dignity in her slow movements, the way her full skirt eddied in and out with her steps.

"What you want?" she asked Thalia.

"Why, that's Wise Woman," Janet exclaimed. "She used to come over to our side of the mountain."

"Well, please make her understand that they have to clear out of here fast," Thalia snapped. "I won't have a pack of thieving redskins camping on my land."

"But these are respectable people from up north," Janet countered trying to suppress her irritation. "Wise Woman is related to our cook at the ranch."

Thalia barely heard her words as she whirled her pony and rode away, shooting an apprehensive glance toward the brush where the black cat had disappeared.

Patiently, Janet tried to explain to Wise Woman why her tribe could no longer camp in Piñon Canyon, that Thalia was the owner of the Toppling R and didn't understand the ways of Western ranchers. Wise Woman seemed equally uncomprehending of the ways of Eastern ranch owners. Just as Janet began to despair of making any headway there was the light drum of hoofs on the trail, and Lee Carlton rode into the camp.

"Thought I saw you riding this way," he called cheerfully. "I see you're visiting the Navajos."

With difficulty, Janet explained Thalia's orders.

"She—she just doesn't understand how the Indians have always camped here to gather piñons," she floundered.

"Sure, I savvy." Lee's dark gaze swept over the litter of the camp, the half dozen dogs whining and barking and scratching fleas, the household belongings strewn on ground and bushes. He grinned sympathetically. "A lady like Miss Mathews naturally couldn't get used to this in a hurry. We'll just move 'em across the canyon and onto my land."

While he patiently argued with Wise Woman Janet tried to make friends with the children who were approaching like shy forest creatures. One little girl finally came near enough to touch Janet's silk scarf.

"You're just like a soft, bronze pansy with black eyes," Janet declared. "I'm going to call you Pansy Face."

She gave the child the scarf, and turned to see Lee wiping his face with his bandanna. Wise Woman was stalking toward the shelter, muttering.

Standing beside Lee, watching the Indians break up camp, it seemed to Janet that the sun had never been so bright, or the call of the bluejays so saucily provocative. It was wonderfully easy to talk to Lee Carlton, so deeply gratifying to hear his rich laughter, and catch the glow of his dark eyes.

WHEN the Navajos finally started across the canyon, Lee and Janet turned toward the Toppling R, and with every mile nearer the ranch Janet felt her new happiness slipping away, leaving her frightened and alone. It seemed to her that Lee's manner changed, that he became abashed and indifferent to her as they approached the big adobe ranchhouse.

Thalia met them at the corral.

"Did you get rid of those savages?" she demanded. "I can't get over the feeling that that horrid old woman was planning trouble. Those cold, beady eyes, and the way she muttered—" Thalia shuddered.

"Wise Woman is the lady Medicine Man of the tribe," Janet remarked, with an impish gleam in her bright eyes.

"Medicine Man?" Thalia's voice was a bit shrill. "Surely they don't still believe in that—that—magic business now!"

"Even civilized people dodge black cats," Janet reminded her, sliding off her pony, "so who can blame the poor Indians for casting spells and believing in curses and charms?"

Janet's just teasing, Thalia, Lee cut in. He sent Janet a frowning glance and her impishness instantly wilted. "Sometimes our brand of Western humor is a little rough," he apologized.

Something with hurt and resentment, Janet presently went up the new flagstoned walk to the house. She wished she knew a little magic. She'd make good use of it right now.

Next day Lee called early for Thalia. Busy at her desk in the very efficient office Thalia had furnished, Janet forlornly watched them slip away. Thalia's blond hair floated lightly in the sunshine, and Lee's head turned to her as if she already had him on a lead rope, Janet reflected unhappily.

The Indian cook, Blowing Grasses, whom Thalia had peremptorily renamed Kate, came to stand stolidly beside the desk.

"Why my people move?" she demanded. "The good camp now. Other place good."

Helplessly, Janet glanced after Thalia and Lee, and Kate followed her glance.

"He savvy," she muttered, and stalked back toward the kitchen with a swish of her many skirts.

It was noon before Janet had finished her work. Feeling lonely, and even a little depressed, she decided to ride over to the Indian camp. It would at least be gay there. She tucked a big box of rich chocolates in the saddlebag, planning to divide it among the Navajo children.

The squaws were, as usual, not very sociable, but the children swarmed around her, emboldened by Pansy Face's proudly displayed scarf. Pansy Face herself soon deserted Janet, slipping away alone into the forest. After a while, Wise Woman made her appearance, and asked where Lee was. She grunted enigmatically when Janet explained he'd gone riding with Thalia.

Janet was halfway home when she remembered the candy for the children. When she looked in the saddlebag she found, to her surprise, that it was quite empty. So, the little monkeys found it themselves, she thought ruefully, and was glad that there was nothing else removable in the saddlebags.

When Thalia returned home she seemed more radiant than ever, and full of high spirits.

"Ranch life isn't nearly so dull as I'd been led to expect," she informed Janet gaily. "Tell me, darling, what does one wear on a moonlight ride in this country? Or would you know?"

"Are you planning a—a picnic?" Janet asked through suddenly dry lips.

"Picnic?" Thalia's bright laughter rang out. "No. We'll not be thinking of—food." She leaned against Janet's desk, enjoying herself. "Let's see. The yellow wool sweater is good with my hair. Or how about all white? That's it. White would be dazzling in the moonlight and there's something bridal about all white that would just set the mood."

Janet's face paled and her eyes dulled with unhappiness. She tried to keep her composure under that amused, merciless stare, but finally she could face Thalia's knowing, mocking smile no longer. When she glanced out the window Janet was almost relieved to see Kate standing there. At least here was a friend. The Indian woman made an imperative gesture with her arm, and Janet stood up.

"Excuse me a moment, Thalia. Kate wants to see me, I think."

Outside Kate said loudly,

"Wise Woman send you something." She brought a small bottle from the folds of her skirt. "She make it for you from the herbs.

You use heem when the moon is full."

"I use it?" Janet asked, with puzzlement. "What for?"

"Get you the man you want," Kate explained. "Powerful medicine. Rub on face and hands. Let the full moon shine on. Get you your man."

"But—but, I don't want anyone," Janet stammered, trying to hand the bottle back to Kate. "Thank Wise Woman, but tell her I don't need her love philter or whatever it is."

"Wise Woman send to you," Kate insisted, and before Janet could protest again, the Indian cook walked away, moving with surprising speed for her bulk.

Trying to hide the bottle in her hand Janet went back to the office. It was humiliating that her feelings for Lee were so obvious that even an old Indian piñon gatherer felt sorry for her.

"What'd Kate want?" Thalia demanded sharply. Her alert glance fastened on Janet's cupped hand. "What did she give you?"

"Just—just—some kind of Indian medicine," Janet muttered, setting the bottle on the filing cabinet. "I'll throw it away, of course."

"Well, come help me get ready for tomorrow night," Thalia insisted maliciously. "I'm sure you know all about ranchers, Janet, and I do want to please Lee. He's so sweet."

Janet gritted her teeth and began to figure how long it would take her to save enough money to get back to town and get another job.

HOWEVER long it would take was too long, she admitted the next morning. She had a strong hunch that if Thalia and Lee actually went on that moonlight ride his capitulation would be complete. She could just imagine Thalia in white riding clothes, with her golden hair a drift of curls, with her lilting laughter and artful ways. What chance would Lee Carlton have against such wiles? He'd be blinded by stardust and glamour and come out of it to find himself corralled for life by an unscrupulous, thrill-seeking siren.

But, thought Janet sadly, trying to blink back desolate tears, there was nothing she could do to prevent Thalia from leading Lee a merry chase across a moon-drenched prairie. She might look like a forest elf, but she had no magic power.

[Turn page]

Sells 95 Stories and Novelettes

"The introduction you gave me to your editor friend, resulting in my present assignment to do a complete novel for him monthly, is doubly appreciated, especially since I finished my N.I.A. training some time ago and, consequently, have no call on your service. Here is concrete evidence that interest in your students continues indefinitely. To date now, I have sold 95 stories and novelettes to 20 national magazines."—Darrel Jordan, P.O. Box 279, Friendship, N. Y.

What makes WRITING ability GROW?

For a number of years, the Newspaper Institute of America has been giving free Writing Aptitude Tests to men and women with literary ambitions.

Sometimes it seems half the people in America who are fired with the desire to write have taken advantage of this offer to measure their ability.

What the tests show

Up to date, no one who could be called a "born writer" has filled out our Writing Aptitude Test. We have not yet discovered a single individual miraculously endowed by nature with all the qualities that go to make up a successful author.

One aspirant has interesting ideas—and a dull, unimaginative style. Another has great creative imagination but is writes than any other experienced story or the authors of today's "best sellers" are newspaper-trained men and women. One advantage of our New York City Desk Method is that it starts you writing and assesses your writing in your own home, on your own time. Week by week, you receive tactical assignments—just as if you were right at work on a great metropolitan staff.

All your writing is individually corrected and critiqued by veteran writers with years of experience. "breaking in" new authors. They will point out those faults of style, structure or viewpoint that keep you from progressing. At the same time, they will give you constructive suggestions for building up and developing your natural aptitudes.

In fact, so stimulating is this association that student-members often begin to sell their work before they finish the course. We do not mean to insinuate that they skyrocket into the "big money" or become prominent overnight. Most beginners are paid with earnings of $25, $50, $100, or more, for material that takes little time to write—advice, articles on business, politics, sports, housewifery, local, club and church activities, etc.—things that can easily be turned out in leisure hours, and often on the impulse of the moment.

For those who want to know—Free Writing Aptitude Test

If you really want to know the truth about your writing ambitions, send for our interesting Writing Aptitude Test. This searching test of your native abilities is free—entirely without obligation. Fill in and send the coupon, Newspaper Institute of America, One Park Ave., New York 16, N. Y. (Forward 1225)

VETERANS: This course approved for Veterans' Training

Free

Newspaper Institute of America
One Park Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

Send me, without cost or obligation, your Writing Aptitude Test and further information about writing for profit.

Mr. }
Mrs. }
Miss }
Address }
.....

Check here if you are eligible under the G.I. Bill of Rights.
(All correspondence confidential. No money will be paid on you.) 94-0-59
Copyright 1946, Newspaper Institute of America.

Now for EVERY WORK SHOP! NEW Invention

Electroplates by BRUSH

Easy to Plate CHROMIUM
GOLD, SILVER, NICKEL, COPPER
... For Pleasure and Profit!

If you have a workshop—at home or in business—you need this new Warner Electroplate. At the stroke of an electrified brush, you can electroplate models and projects—you can replate worn articles, faucets, tools, fixtures, silverware, etc. with a durable, sparkling coat of metal... Gold, Silver, Chromium, Nickel, Copper or Cadmium. Method is easy, simple, quick. Everything furnished—equipment complete, ready for use. By doing a bit of work for others, your machine can pay for itself within a week. So make your shop complete by getting a Warner Electroplate. Send today for FREE SAMPLE and illustrated literature. ACT AT ONCE! Mod Coupon. WARNER ELECTRIC CO., Dept. H-663 N. Wells St., Chicago 10, Illinois

Learn Profitable Profession in 90 days at Home

MEN AND WOMEN, 18 to 50—Many Swedish Massage since professions make $20, $50 or even more. Tareo full time incomes from doctors, hospitals, dentists, restaurants, clubs or private parties. Others make good money in spare time. You can win by treating at home and receiving for Hundred Book FREE—Now! THE CAREER of Swedish Massage, Dept. 6630, 100 E.
Ohio St., Chicago 11, Ill.

Good Used DRESSES 5-395

ORIGINAL VALUES UP TO $14.00
Used dresses, selected and pressed. Assorted styles.
Sizes 12 to 20, 5 for $3.95. Sizes 38 to 48—5 for $4.95. Assorted colors. Size extra desired. Send
$1.00 with order, balance C.O.D. plus postage. MER-CHANDISE GUARANTEED or money refunded. Hundreds of other unusual bargains. WRITE FOR FREE ILLUSTRATED CATALOG
IDEAL MAIL ORDER CO., Dept. M
2632 Atlantic Avenue Brooklyn 7, N. Y.

What To Do For Pains of ARTHRITIS Try This Free

If you have never used "Rosse Tabs" for pains or arthritis, neuritis, rheumatism, we want you to try them at our risk. We will send you a full-size package from which you are to use 24 Tabs FREE. If not astonished at the palliative relief which you enjoy from your sufferings, return the package and you owe us nothing. We mean it! SEND NO MONEY. Just send name and address and we will rush your Tabs by return mail. ROSSE PRODUCTS CO., Dept. 633, 2708 Farwell Ave., Chicago 45, Illinois.

It was evident, the next morning, that Thalia wasn't taking any chances with Janet. She appeared after breakfast with a list of errands in town that would keep Janet busy all day. So Janet departed, her pointed face downcast, the gray eyes still and shadowy, and the red mouth unsmiling.

When she returned it was late afternoon, and shadows lay long and pointed as crows' feathers across the road. With sinking heart, she watched the sun dance on the western rim of the mountains. It would be a perfectly wonderful evening, still and sweet and lovely. A night for romance.

No sooner had she closed the door and started down the hall than a veritable tornado of words descended on her. It resolved into Thalia, who was lashing out recriminations with such fury that Janet for a blinding moment almost believed the blond girl had lost her reason.

"You're fired!" Thalia finally shouted out. "And I should sue you for trying to disfigure me for life!"

Gasping and speechless, Janet backed away. And Thalia followed her into the office. There the light struck full on the blond girl's face, showing it swollen and blotched, the once blue eyes now mere fiery slits between puffed lids.

"Go ahead and gloat over your handiwork!" screamed Thalia. "And then pack your bags and get out! Get out of my house and off my ranch, and if you dare use one of my horses I'll have you arrested for horse stealing!"

Bewildered, stunned, Janet escaped to her room. Yet, through the shock, she began to feel a sense of relief—relief that she was no longer working for Thalia Mathews. She couldn't think about the long miles into town, or how she'd make them afoot, with darkness coming and herself burdened with two heavy suitcases. Nor dared she think about Lee and never seeing him again.

But even this fleeting recollection of him caused a great rush of grief and longing. Tears filled her eyes as she flung her belongings into the cases.

Presently when the last garment had been packed away, Janet dried her eyes, and trying to keep her face as blank as a mask, she walked out into the hall. She was about to set her suitcases down and reach for the door, when it suddenly swung open. It was Lee Carlton, and his eyes were troubled.

"Howdy, Janet," he declared heartily. The genuine friendliness and warmth in his voice almost broke down her hard-held reserve.

"Listen," he hurried on, "tell Thalia for me that I'm sorry but I can't make it for that ride tonight. I know she said she'd be tied up all day and so couldn't go out with me to look over that piece of land. We decided to go tonight because there's a full moon. But now something's come up."

It must be her imagination, Janet thought, that colored his hurried, apologetic explanation with relief.

"Something came up?" she echoed, clutching at anything to keep him there longer so she could look up at him, catch the dark glint of his eyes, hear the warm, rich tones of his voice for the last time.

"Yeah, one of the Indian kids was taken sick suddenly and I'm driving them into the doctor. Could be appendicitis or something serious."

There was the sound of a door flung wide and Thalia stood in the doorway of her darkened bedroom.

"Did I hear you say you were standing me up?" she demanded, her voice thin and sharp.

Lee turned toward her.

"There's no one else can go and the kid—"

Thalia's brittle laugh cut him off.

"Well, I'm glad to know just how I stand with you. As it happens I wasn't going on that ride anyhow. I'm leaving on the night train to Los Angeles. And as soon as I see my broker this place will be for sale and good riddance!"

Lee took a quick step toward her.

"You really mean that?"

Unbelieving, "You'll sell the ranch?"

"Gladly," she flung out, and then slammed her door shut.

Janet caught Lee's arm.

"Which Indian child is sick?" she asked troubled. "The smallest? The one I called Pansy Face?"

He nodded. "Poor little tyke's doubled up with cramps. They don't know why, but I don't believe in taking chances."

"I know what's the matter with Pansy Face," Janet exclaimed suddenly, and proceeded to tell Lee about the chocolates taken from her saddlebag.

"Well, that's sure a relief," Lee declared. He glanced warily toward Thalia's closed door. "What in tarnation struck her? Last I knew she was crazy about the valley."

[Turn page]

$100 MONTHLY
IF SICK OR INJURED
PLUS HOSPITAL
BILLS PAID!

Greatest Protection
EVER OFFERED FOR ONLY $1 A MONTH

ACCUMULATED CASH!
 Policy pays for accidental loss of life, limb or sight up to $4,000, accumulated to $6000.00

ACCIDENT BENEFITS!
 Policy pays for accident disability at rate up to $100 per month, for as long as 24 months, or $2400.00

SICKNESS BENEFITS!
 Policy pays for loss of time due to sickness, a regular monthly income, for as long as 24 months, up to $100.00 PER MO.

PLUS Hospitalization Plan!
 Pays $5 per day and other hospital expenses. For maternity up to $50. Sickness and accident, as specified, to over $650.00

Added millions can now afford all-round insurance protection. This policy, costing actually less than $1-a-month, issued by an old-line LEGAL RESERVE company, provides liberal amounts of QUICK CASH when sickness or accident strikes, to replace lost income, pay hospital, doctor bills, etc. Covers any and all accidents, all the common sicknesses. No waiting period for benefits!

NO MEDICAL EXAMINATION required! No red tape! Policy issued BY MAIL at BIG SAVINGS. Ages 15 to 69. Actual Policy sent for 10 Days' FREE Examination. ACT NOW! Write for it today. No cost. No obligation. No salesman will call.

FREE 10-Day Inspection Coupon

THE SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
 773-B Service Life Bldg. Omaha 2, Nebr.
 Without cost or obligation, send your GOLD SEAL $1-A-MONTH Policy for 10 DAYS' FREE INSPECTION.

Name _____
 Address _____ Age _____
 City _____ State _____
 Beneficiary _____

CARPENTERS AND BUILDERS GUIDES

INSIDE TRADE INFORMATION FOR Carpenters, Builders, Joiners, Millwrights, and All Woodworkers. These Guides give you the practical instructions that you want—individual, new methods, plans, suggestions, plans, systems and everything you need. An easy, concise course for the ambitious and efficient. A practical daily helper and quick reference for the master worker. Carpenters everywhere are using these Guides as a lifetime hand to know Work, Better Work and Better Pay.

● INSIDE TRADE INFORMATION ON: 4 VOLS. $6..

How to use the steel square—How to find and set squares—How to build furniture—How to use a miter box—How to use the chisel—How to use the rule and square—How to make joints—Carpenters' anatomy—Joining—Measurement problems—Estimating strength of timbers—How to set girders and sills—How to trim houses and roofs—Trusses, bungalows, etc.—How to read and draw plans—Drawing up specifications—How to estimate—How to set outtings 12, 16 and 17 on the steel square—How to build boxes and crates—How to build tables—How to put on interior trim—How to hang doors—How to lay—How floors—How to paint and insulate.

To get this assistance for yourself simply fill in and mail the FREE COUPON below.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

OCCUPATION _____

REFERENCE _____

AUEL, Publishers, 49 West 23rd St., New York 10, N.Y.
Mail Auel's Carpenters and Builders Guides, 4 vols., on 7 days free trial. If O.K. I will remit $1 in 7 days and $1 monthly until $6 is paid. Name _____

STUDY AT HOME

Legally trained men win higher positions and bigger success in business and public life. Greater opportunities now than ever before. More Ability: More Prestige: More Money We give you extra training at home during spare time. Degree of LL.B. We furnish all text material, including 16 volumes. Low 12-hour law cost, easy terms. Get our valuable 2-page "Law Training for Leadership" and "Business" leaflets. Send for FILES bulletin today. No obligation. LASALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY, 417 South Dearborn Street, A Correspondence Institution Dept. 6329-L Chicago 5, Ill.

LEARN MEAT CUTTING At Home — In Spare Time

Get into the vital meat industry. Complete, practical training based on 25 years proven instruction method used at National's famous meat school. Prepares you for bigger pay as meat cutter, supervisor, market manager or more money in your own store. Go as rapidly as your spare time permits. Diploma. Start NOW to turn your spare hours into money. Send for FILES bulletin today. No obligation. National School of Meat Cutting, Inc., Dept. TG-15, Toledo 4, Ohio

STOP TOBACCO?

Banish the craving for tobacco as thousands have. Make yourself free and happy with Tobacco Redeemer. Write for free booklet telling of astonishing effect of tobacco and of a treatment which has relieved many men.

30 Years in Business
THE NICHOLL COMPANY
153 Clayton Bldg., St. Louis 5, Mo.

FREE BOOK

BEHIND YOUR CONSCIOUS MIND

Do you use just your thinking mind? If you do, you are missing 90 per cent of your possibilities. Those occasional hunches are the urges of a vast sleeping force in your inner mind. Learn to develop and direct it. Push obstacles aside and master life with an energy you have overlooked. Send for FREE SEALED BOOK. It tells how to obtain these teachings. Address: Scriba D.M.J.

The ROSICRUCIANS
SAN JOSE [AMORC] CALIFORNIA

CRAZY about a certain rancher in the valley, you mean Janet thought, and painfully her troubles swept back over her. She stood there fighting back the tears, conscious of Lee regarding her with puzzled, concerned eyes, when there came a shuffling step down the hall.

Kate the Indian cook, came up to them.

"Missy lose this?" she demanded, and held out a small bottle.

Janet winced.

"No," she said faintly. "I didn't lose it, Kate. I left it in the office."

"I find heem in boss' waste basket this morning," Kate stated. "Empty."

"S-so it is," Janet agreed, staring in fascination at the bottle. "Kate, what was in that bottle?" She suddenly cried.

The Indian woman's teeth shone in a mirthful smile.

"Nothing but leetle water and crushed poison oak leaves, missy."

"Poison oak?" Janet gasped. "You—you meant for me to rub that on my face?"

"Not you, missy," Kate explained. "Wise Woman know you no fool." She jerked her head toward Thalia's door. "She's always snooping."

Now Kate looked down at Janet's suitcases and grunted.

"Boss kick you out, missy? How you get to town?" Her beady black glance fixed on Lee, who was watching them with bewilderment.

Janet bit her lip. She blinked fast, but two tears squeezed out and rolled down her cheeks. Then, abruptly, she was caught tight in Lee's arms, and her face snuggled against his shoulder.

Faintly she heard Kate's placid voice.

"Me called Blowing Grasses," the Indian woman was saying, and with a soft shuffle of footsteps she was gone.

Lee was saying something in a muffled voice, and now that Janet's swift storm of sobbing had stopped she could make out the words.

"—been wanting to do this since the day I met you. But I always figured business should come first. Fact is, if I didn't get the Toppling R to sell Piñon Canyon to me

Read Our Companion Magazine RODEO ROMANCES

Now on Sale — 15c At All Stands!

pronto, my spread was going to dry up and blow away."

Janet stirred in his arms.

"Then you wanted to meet Thalia s-so bad just to buy that canyon from her?"

Gently, Lee pushed her away so that he could look down into her face.

"Why else?" he asked blankly.

Janet's face brightened as though a light blazed from her very heart.

Swiftly Lee was taking hold of her luggage, and drawing her outside.

"Let's get out of here," he murmured huskily.

Walking toward the hitchrack in the rosy glow of the sunset he smiled down at her.

"Reckon it'll take some explainin' to get this all straightened out," he remarked. "But right now, even if I didn't know this whole danged spread would be up for sale, I'd forget everything else but holding onto the girl I aim to marry."

He stopped short, dropped the suitcases and swung Janet into his arms.

"I sure caught me a fairy queen that day in Piñon Canyon," he declared, kissing her full and warm on the lips.

Then Janet, spinning away into a world of enchantment, knew that the wonder of their love was the strongest magic ever brewed.

America's Best Dime's Worth of Picture Entertainment!

NOW ON SALE AT ALL STANDS

Make Your Start NOW!

RADIO ELECTRONICS TELEVISION

Learn the National way with the latest electronic equipment and appliances

Millions of dollars being spent—thousands of men needed—the whole field of Electronics: Radio, Television, Frequency Modulation, Industrial Control and Power is right at the start of the GREATEST INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION IN HISTORY. This is YOUR OPPORTUNITY and this is the surest way to get in and go forward to success.

SHOP METHOD HOME TRAINING

—the practical speed up course of a great residential technical trade school. Quick, easy, practical—based on REAL EXPERIENCE with genuine parts and equipment you get with your course. Build your own long distance, high fidelity superheterodyne. Perform hundreds of electronic experiments. Be a practical, experienced technician right from the start. Get the good pay of a specialist. Get into business for yourself. Mail the coupon for details, now!

has trained ambitious men for better pay and a greater future for more than 40 years. Est. in 1903.

FREE LESSON

Investigate this training without a penny cost. See how easy and quick you can get ahead in the modern science of Electronics without previous experience. Your name and address on the coupon below is all that is needed to bring you a sample lesson FREE and the big Vocational Opportunity. Book. Send it now.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS
4000 S. Figueroa St., Los Angeles 37, Cal.

MAIL COUPON

NATIONAL SCHOOLS, Dept. TG-6
4000 S. Figueroa St., Los Angeles 37, Cal.

Paste on a penny postcard

Send the FREE Lesson, Vocational Book and details. I understand no salesman from National will call on me.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Age _____

Include Zone Number

$3, $10, $15
FOR ONE DRAWING

Be an ARTIST!

—Train at Home in Your Spare Time

The fascinating field of Art offers commercial opportunities to men and women. COMMERCIAL ART, CARTOONING, DESIGNING all in one complete course. We prepare you step-by-step. Trained Artists are capable of earning $40, $50, $75 a week. Colorful FREE BOOK, "Art for Pleasure and Profit"—describes course and method of instruction. TWO ART OUTFITS included with training. STATE AGE, WASHINGTON SCHOOL OF ART, Studio 666C 1115—15th St., N. W. WASHINGTON 5, D. C.

FREE
BOOK gives details

ANALYZE HANDWRITING

quality for Certified Grapho-Analyst Degree. New uncrowded, fascinating field of service. Gratifying earnings reported by graduates in Employment, Credit, Social Service, Police and Judicial, and Insurance and other fields. Others have developed profitable private practice, full or spare time, as Personal Problem and Vocational Counselors. Send for 3000 word test lesson and Grapho-Analyst FREE

ADDRESS: A. I. G. A. Inc., 142 NOEL MO.

PICTURE
RING $1.

Request this like Picture Ring made from any photo. Send no money! Mail photo with paper strip for ring size. Pay postman only $1.50 plus postage. Ring fitted for extra. Photo returned with ring. Money back guarantee. Send photo and ring size for PORTRAIT RING CO. Dept. C-28, Cincinnati, O.

Mail from Any Photo or Picture!
SEND NO MONEY!

5 USED
Street Dresses $4.90

We make every effort to bring you the biggest dress bargains in the country. Some of these dresses were easily worth up to $10.00 each when new. Associated colors and materials. Send $1.00 deposit with order, balance C.O.D. plus postage. State size preferred. Money refunded in full if not satisfied. Many other clothing bargains for entire family. Free Catalog.

292 ROCKAWAY AVENUE, DEPT. AX, BROOKLYN 12, N. Y.

BARGAIN SALE!

Genuine Guaranteed
SWISS WATCHES
WITH JEWEL MOVEMENTS

99¢

JUST ARRIVED!
LIMITED QUANTITY

Yes, even these days there are bargains in hard-to-get jewelry! Distinctive, new, handsome, known for accurate time-keeping, modern style in design—linear quality. Built by Swiss craftsmen, tested by their superb specialists in materials and workmanship. Finest adjustable band sets off attractive elegant case to excellent advantage. You'll thrill with this beautiful sturdy Precision GUARANTEED Swiss One Jewel movement. Easy to read dial. Come in beautiful gift box.

Send No Money—Wear at Our Risk Written Guarantee With Every Watch

Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Back. Price of men's sturdy dependable wrist watch only $9.45. Price of ladies' exquisite dainty wrist watch only $9.45. Please send name, address, and tell us which watch is wanted. Pay postman C.O.D. plus a few cents postage and 10% Federal Tax. The supply is limited, so order today. Immediate delivery.

International Diamond Co., 2435 Indiana, Dept. 3393, Chicago

AROUND THE BRANDING FIRE

(Continued from page 10)

ments were treated in the same manner. Those went upon the two piles.

Mrs. Long gasped as she saw him turn to her personal wardrobe as he completed the destruction of his own. All her finery was given the same treatment, thrown on the two piles. After that he assailed the kitchen stove, breaking it apart with an axe, and so on until every utensil, chair and whatnot in the house was broken into fragments.

"There yuh are," said Colonel Long to his missus. "You've got half of the money and you can now take yore pick o' the rest!"

The stage had come along on its way to Sacramento and the colonel hailed it.

"Mrs. Long's goin' down the road a bit to see some of her kin and git a breath of fresh air," he said. "Take her as far as this double eagle'll pay for, and then she'll tell whar else she wants to go."

That, fellahs and gals, is the celebrated divorce story of Colonel Jack Long of the California gold diggin's, who later come to swell the list of guests at the famous Shoo Fly Restaurant, what was not run by a widow, in the early town of Tucson, Arizona!

LETTERS FROM READERS

THE other day I stepped into the office where I hang my hat times when I ain't wearin' same. I wasn't lookin' where I was goin' and I tripped and fell head-first into a big basket of letters from members of the BRANDING FIRE CLUB.

Reckon I must have looked plumb silly with my head and shoulders buried in all that mail and my legs waving around in the breeze. Anyway the boss is passin' by and he stops and stands there lookin' at me.

"We certainly get a lot of mail for the AROUND THE BRANDING FIRE department," he says just like nothin' had happened.

"Glub," I says, for I never could talk good with my mouth full of envelopes and postcards. "Guble—glub."

"You never told me you could talk Indian, Tex," says the boss. "You surprise me."

By that time I had managed to get out of the basket, and was standin' on my feet and feelin' as foolish as I looked.

"Wouldn't it be easier to look over the mail without standin' on yore head?" asks the boss.

He went away before I could answer, but all the same I knew that he was pleased at all the mighty fine letters we're constantly gettin' from club members and I'm plumb tickled pink.

If there are some of yuh that haven't joined THE BRANDING FIRE CLUB then get busy and do it right away. Yuh'll find the coupon in this department. All yuh got to do is fill it and mail it to us with a stamped, self-addressed return envelope so we can send yore free membership card to you right away.

And now, gather around, all of you, and let's start lookin' over the mail. Just to be shore and get in as much mail as possible we may cut yore letters down a little—but it's just to save space. And remember we shore thank all of yuh for writin' and join THE BRANDING FIRE CLUB. Let's go!

Please make room for a new-comer from the West. I'm 5 feet 3 inches tall, have brown hair and blue eyes. I used to be a rodeo rider so can tell some interesting stories. My hobbies are collecting souvenir spoons, salt and pepper shakers and odd cream pitchers. The first five to send me any of these will get a large tinted picture of myself.

Mildred Hartman.

1703 2nd Ave. No., Great Falls, Montana.

I have been reading THRILLING RANCH STORIES for sometime now and the more I read this magazine the better I like it. I am 18 years old, 5 feet 7½ inches tall, weigh 140 lbs. and have dark brown hair and blue eyes. My hobbies are collecting poems of all kinds, and I love horseback riding, fishing and camping in the wide open spaces.

Doris Brokens.

16552 Ventura Blvd., Encino, California.

I am 15 years old, have blonde hair, gray eyes and am 5 feet 3 inches tall. My favorite hobbies are horseback riding, bike riding, collecting foreign money, collecting picture postcards and photographs. I promise to answer all letters.

(Miss) Billie Waldrys.

Box 981, Alamogordo, New Mexico.

I am 18 years old, weigh 132 lbs. and am 5 feet 4 inches tall. Have dark brown hair and eyes. I like to ride horses, hunt and swim. I play the guitar and sing.

Keziah Boston.

McLean, Va.

I am 18 years old, have blond hair, brown eyes, am 5 feet 7 inches tall and weigh 150 lbs. My favorite hobbies are playing the violin and riding horseback. I will exchange letters and photos with anyone.

Floyd Stoner.

R. 1, Box 93, Tepton, California.

I am 5 feet 1 inch tall, weigh 105 lbs. and have dark blond hair and blue eyes. I will answer all letters.

Mildred Caswell.

R. 1, Litchfield, Maine.

I am 33 years old, 5 feet 4½ inches tall and weigh 150 lbs. I have dark wavy hair, brown

[Turn page]

The Steady Pay Profession Good Times or Bad!

SCIENTIFIC CRIME DETECTION

It Is Easy to Learn!

FOLLOW
THIS MAN

Operator
No. 33

FREE!

"BLUE BOOK OF CRIME"

This book is full of exciting information on scientific crime detection. It will show how you can get started in a grand career. Now, at amazingly low cost. Clip coupon now... Mail it today.

I will teach you this fascinating science during your spare time at home. It pays to be an expert in Finger Printing, Firearms Identification, Police Photography, and Secret Service Methods. I have trained hundreds of men and women now successfully serving in identification bureaus throughout America. You, too, may quickly prepare yourself to become a well-paid valued officer of the law, often sharing in the generous rewards offered for wanted criminals.

53 PER CENT of all Identification Bureaus in the U. S. employ students and graduates of I. A. S. A majority of these men are heads of Bureaus. Many of them know nothing about crime detection before training with me. Now they have steady jobs, excellent salaries and a fine future. Write today for full particulars and free book. Give age.

INSTITUTE OF APPLIED SCIENCE

1920 Sunnyside Ave., Dept. 796-A

Chicago 40, Ill.

INSTITUTE OF APPLIED SCIENCE

1920 Sunnyside Ave., Dept. 796-A, Chicago 40

Gentlemen: Without any obligation on my part, send me the "Blue Book of Crime," and complete list of Identification Bureaus employing your students or graduates, together with your low prices and Easy Terms Offer. (Literature will be sent ONLY to persons stating their age.)

Name.....

Address.....

Age.....

L E N V E G L A S S E S S T Y L E S

TRY by MAIL NOW

SEND NO MONEY

TEST YOUR OWN SIGHT at home with our New Patented Sight Testers.

16 DAYS' TRIAL OFFER — As Low As $2.95 Complete

GLASSES — MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE!

If you're not 100% satisfied with glasses we make we will refund every cent you pay us. Request a FREE CATALOG and scientific test chart. 1701-1703 Monroe St., N. E., Washington, D. C. 18.

FREE 1937 MILWAUKEE AVE., U. S. EYE-GLASSES CO. DEPT. 8-62, CHICAGO, ILL.

DETECTIVES

TRAINING—SECRET INVESTIGATIONS—FINGER PRINTS
Fare Method—Short Time—Home—Travel—Secret—Cost-Reduced
FREE—WRITE: INTERNATIONAL DETECTIVE SYSTEM, 1701-1703
Monroe St., N. E., Washington, D. C. 18.

FREE ENLARGEMENT of your Favorite Photo

FROM FAMOUS HOLLYWOOD FILM STUDIOS

Just to get acquainted we will make a beautiful 6 x 7 enlargement of any picture or negative. Be sure to include color of hair, eyes and clothing and get our bargain offer for having your enlargement beautifully hand-colored in oil and mounted in your choice of handsome frames. Please enclose 1lb and your original picture or negative will be returned with the See 5 x 7 enlargement postpaid. Act now! Limit 2 to a customer.

HOLLYWOOD FILM STUDIOS
7021 Santa Monica Blvd., Dept. 943, Hollywood, Calif.

thousand uses for this welder around your home, garage, workshop. Also in garages, factories, repair shops, tin shops; mechanics, inventors, plumbers, farmers, etc.

Order a "VICTORY MODEL" HANDIWELD today!

SEND NO MONEY We'll rush one to you with rules, home operating instructions, and all necessary literature. Pay nothing now. Pay postman only $1.50 plus five cent postage per part with the exception of the Victory Model Handiweled in days from receipt. If not delighted return Victory Model Handiweled in days from receipt and money paid for it will be refunded promptly. Rush your order now!

KUMFY PRODUCTS, Dept. H-2333, Cincinnati 25, Ohio

PLAY GUITAR LIKE THE COWBOYS
DO  A LESSON

Just out—our latest guaranteed, complete, easy-reading, cowboy edition of "The Western way in a few minutes" by Burgess and Lamont now features the most detailed and complete, unique, step-by-step instruction on the subject of playing the guitar.

SEND NO MONEY For postman only $1.50 charge, or send $1.00 and $1.00 later. EXTRA BONUS all postpaid. Guarantee, $1.25 money order only. Nothing else to buy. Positive money back refund. Check order.

WESTERN RANGER STUDIOS, Dept. 476, Hutchinson, Kans.

do.you WORRY?

Why worry and suffer any longer if we can help you? Try a Brooks Patented Air Cushion. This marvelous appliance for most forms of reducible rupture is GUARANTEED to bring YOU happy comfort and security—day and night—at work and play—or it costs you NOTHING. Thousands happy. Light, neat-sitting. No hard pads or springs. For men, women, and children. Durable, cheap.

SENT on trial to prove it. Not sold in stores. Beware of imitations. Write for a Book on Rupture, and a 10-day trial order, and proof of results. All Correspondence Confidential.

ABOUT RUPTURE

Brooks Company, 382 State St., Marshall, Mic

BE A Nurse

MAKE $25-$35 A WEEK

You can learn practical nursing at home in spare time. Course endorsed by physicians. Thousands of graduates. $100 per year. One graduate has charge of 10-bed hospital. Another saved $400 while learning. Enrollment included. Men, women 18 to 35. Free School not required. Easy tuition payments. Trial plan. Write today.

CHICAGO SCHOOL OF NURSING
Dept. 425, 100 East Ohio Street, Chicago, 1, Ill.
Please send free booklet and 15 sample lesson plans.

Name _____
City _____ State _____ Age _____

eyes. I live out of the city with Mother and Father and I get mighty lonesome.

Harold Carpenter.
4th St. Ext., Route 1, Barberton, Ohio.

I am 16 years old, and have dark brown curly hair. I love all kinds of sports, especially horseback riding. My hobby is collecting movie star pictures and cowboy songs. I will answer all letters I receive.

Phyllis Lonsinger.
1009 D, Fulkerson St., Bagley Downs, Vancouver, Washington.

I am not entirely a shut-in but near it. Have a bad crippled leg and about all I can do is read, write letters and listen to my radio. I enjoy THRILLING RANCH STORIES and would like to hear from pen pals young or old, male and female, and I will guarantee to answer all letters. I love youngsters and to write letters and to go to church.

E. 39 Glass Ave., Spokane, 13, Washington. G. E. Carpenter.

I have been reading THRILLING RANCH STORIES for some time and like it very much. I am a French-Canadian girl, 23 years old, 5 feet 2 inches tall and weigh 130 lbs. Have brown hair and brown eyes. I am taking a course in hair-dressing and beauty work and I have lots of time to write letters so how about writing to me.

Fane Deveau.
43 Victoria Road, Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada.

I am 16 years old, have brown hair and eyes. Weigh 123 lbs. and am 5 feet 5 inches tall. My hobbies are swimming, bicycle riding and hiking. Would like to hear from everyone so come on and write.

Marguerite Barrett.
Herrick Avenue, Warrensburg, N. Y.

I am 19 years old, 5 feet 1 inch tall, weigh 105 lbs. and have dark brown hair and hazel eyes. Will answer all letters.

113 E. Park Ave., Dubois, Pa. Rita Freener.

I am 15 years old, have bright red hair that is naturally curly, brown eyes, and am 5 feet 6 inches tall and weigh 130 lbs. I love to read, write and ride horses, also swimming is my favorite sport. I will answer all letters received.

Martha Jean McLain.
Rural Route No. 3, Reed City, Mich.

I am 5 feet 4 inches tall, and have light brown curly hair and brown eyes. My favorite pastimes are many. Will answer all letters.

Margaret Welker.
Route 3, Box 174, Morgantown, W. Va.

I am 5 feet tall, have light brown hair and dark brown eyes. I enjoy all kinds of sports and like music and dancing. Will exchange snapshots.

99 Hallock Street, Jamestown, New York. Mary Depas.

I live on a 3500 acre ranch. Have 600 head of cattle, horses. I am 40 years old, 6 feet 3 inches tall. Have black hair, blue eyes and am still single. Anything you want to know about ranch life? Come on you folks, let's go to the rodeo today.

A. M. Morse.
c/o C. V. East, Molson, Washington.

I am 21 years old, have brown eyes and brown curly hair. My hobbies are collecting cowboy pictures and writing cowboy songs.

Ruth Lee Howard.
3767 E. Tulace St., Fresno, California.

I've been reading THRILLING RANCH STORIES for many years but have never been as lonely as I am now. So won't someone please write? I am a war widow, 24 years old. Have brown hair, brown eyes and am easy to get along with. I promise to answer all letters.

Sue G. Klimas.
516 Terrace St., Hanesdale, Pa.

I certainly enjoy reading THRILLING RANCH STORIES very much. The stories are really tops. Also your companion Western magazines are likewise interesting reading. I am 27 years old, 5 feet 6 inches tall. Have light brown hair and gray-blue eyes. I play stringed instruments and like to sing, also have many other interesting hobbies.

Kay Newcomb.
Fenwick, Michigan.

That's all for this time—but we'll print more of yore fine letters in coming issues. And here's a list of some more folks who are new BRANDING FIRE CLUB members:

Louise Williams, 1313 N. Adams St., Bay City, Michigan.

Betty Coppes, Route 5, Defiance, Ohio.
Nelda E. Capson, Box 1052, McGill, N.Y.
Lorrie Holberton, 46 Chippendale Rd., Rochester 12, N. Y.

Freddie Osborne, 615 Field Ave., Detroit 14, Mich.
Betty Muninger, Lance Creek, Wyoming.
Blanche Curson, 82 Northumberland St., Deverham Rd., Norwich, England.

Irene Andrews, R. D. 1, Box 164, Eldred, Pa.
Gladys C. Poore, Keysville, Virginia.
Teresa Dovsky, 204 Federal Street N. S., Pittsburgh, Pa.

George Valley, Dunnyfields Farm, Newport, R. I.
Dorlene Umberger, Britton, So. Dak.
Pat Murphy, Route 3, Snohomish, Wash.

Betty Crelvan, Box 142, Blue Rapids, Kansas.
Glenda Porter, Route 5, Mayfield, Ky.
Leon K. Shivono, P. O. Station D, Cleveland, Ohio.
Mrs. Opal Armstrong, 643 Highland Ave., Queensboro, Ky.

Mary Depas, 99 Hallowick Street, Jamestown, N. Y.
Ruby Catherine Payne, 203 Sixteenth Street, Knoxville, Tenn.
Addie Fiez, Route 1, Box 133, Crows Landing, California.

Nancy Gillilan, 513½ Jefferson St., Waterloo, Iowa.
Lena Brooks, Route 2, East Gadsden, Ala.
Nelda Haanel, Rt. 1, Box 407, Fairbanks, Texas.

Esther Trine, Box 153, Rt. 1, Sun Valley Ranch, Sheridan, Ore.
Merry Hill, Box 78m Brookings, Oregon.
Katherine Doshen, R. D. 1, Tarentum, Penn.

Shore was mighty good to hear from all you members of THE BRANDING FIRE CLUB. We are thanking each and every one of you for being with us.

[Turn page]

"I TALKED WITH GOD"

Impossible—you say? No, it is not impossible. You can do the same thing. For there has come to the earth a brilliant, shining revelation of the Power of The Spirit of God. It has come because the human race, thru the Atomic Bomb—could very easily annihilate itself. So the Spirit of God has spoken, and the revelation and the Power that is following, stagger the imagination. In the past 18 years, MORE THAN HALF A MILLION people have told us without our asking them, what happened when they too discovered the actual and literal Power of The Spirit of God, right here on earth, in their own lives.

The future is dangerous. Fear fills most hearts. But may I say to you that there can come into your life, dancing flashes of the Spiritual Power of God? I mean NOW. And when you do find, and know this beautiful Power whatever problems, trials, fears which may beset you, melt away under the shimmering Power of God. In place of these fears, doubts, and trials, there comes a lovely Peace—a Peace which only God can give—and POWER?—well—the human race knows little of this POWER, which upsets many old concepts of God, and puts in YOUR hands, and mine, the Power Jesus promised when He said:—"The things that I do shall ye do also."

Dr. Frank B. Robinson

I want you to know of this Power. I live for no other purpose. For when this dynamic, invisible Power changed my life, my duty was very plain. TELL OTHERS—that's what God said to me, and I've been doing that faithfully for the past 18 years. Write me a simple postcard, 2 letter, NOW, and ask for my 6000 word message, which will give you a slight insight into the most soul-stirring revelation from God this world has ever known. Address me as follows:—"DR. FRANK B. ROBINSON, Dept. TG-46 Moscow, Idaho, and this message, which is TOTALLY FREE, will be sent by mail immediately. But write now—are you forget? The address again—Dr. Frank B. Robinson, Dept. TG-46, Moscow, Idaho.

The Psychiana Religion is, as its name implies, a religious Movement operating under Idaho non-profit religious charter. We are in our 18th year of exclusive operation thru the mails. More than half a million people EACH MONTH receive our literature. We operate in our own peculiar way which is different from that of any other religion in America. Dr. Robinson is Bishop of Idaho (Eastern Rite). We plead with every American to allow us to point out this new revelation of the Spirit of God. It is the only revelation which can bring permanent Peace to the human race. It has its inspiration in the Realm of The Spirit of God.

COPYRIGHT 1946 "THE ARCHBISHOP OF PSYCHIANA"

WHEN BOOMS GO BUST WILL YOU BE BROKE OR BUSY in a well-paying GOVERNMENT JOB?

THRU CIVIL SERVICE

CAREER TRAINING INSTITUTE will

...prepare you NOW (Men and Women) at home thru broad, intensive, simple training to take tests for good jobs offered in Civil Service. Hundreds of classifications, many jobs for 1946, every chance to advance. Vacations with pay, pensions, sick leaves. No layoffs, no strikes, no discrimination. Our course is so inexpensive, no sensible person should delay mailing coupon TODAY.

CAREER TRAINING INSTITUTE, Dept. 205
1060 Broad Street, Newark 2, N. J.

Please send me FACTS regarding Government Employment (Civil Service), and how your course will help prepare me for tests.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ Zone _____ State _____
Veteran? ☐ Yes ☐ No

VETERANS GET PREFERENCE

TOOTHACHE?

GET QUICK AMAZING RELIEF by using Dent's Tooth Gum or Drops in cavity of aching tooth. Cavity toothache frequently strikes when you can't see dentist. He recommended for you.

either complete aid package, 50¢ or 25¢

DENT'S TOOTH GUM TOOTH DROPS

STAMMER?

This new 128-page book, "Stammering, Its Cause and Correction," describes the Bogue Unit Method for scientific correction of stammering and stuttering — successful for 45 years. Free — no obligation.

Benjamin N. Bogue, Dept. C1267, Circle Tower, Indianapolis 4, Ind.

GET THIS
FREE
BOOK!

Learn modern watch and clock repairing

Athens, spare time. Good field now security and contentment in future. Start part-time business and earn while you learn. 100-hour in precision instrument work — a great field with big potential opportunities. Easy self-instruction course, or class. Money-back guarantee. Write now for Free Brochure, Catalogue. NELSON CO., 1139 S. Wabash Ave., Dept. 3906 Chicago 4, Illinois

Free for Asthma

If you suffer with attacks of Asthma so terrible you choke and gasp for breath, if restful sleep is impossible because of the struggle to breathe, if you feel the disease is slowly wearing your life away, don't fail to send at once to the Frontier Asthma Co. for a free trial of a remarkable method. No matter where you live or whether you have any faith in any remedy under the Sun, send for this free trial. If you have suffered a lifetime and tried everything you could learn of without relief; even if you are utterly discouraged, do not abandon hope but send today for this free trial. It will cost you nothing. Address:

FRONTIER ASTHMA CO.

152-T Frontier Bldg.

Everybody please address all your letters and postcards to the Editor, THRILLING RANCH STORIES, 10 East 40th Street, New York, 16, N. Y. Thank you!

OUR NEXT ISSUE

HERE we go just bursting with pride. Yes, sir, we're feelin' pleased as all getout. And why, you ask, just as though I wasn't goin' to tell yuh anyway. It's because of the fine collection of stories we've got all set and ready for the next issue of THRILLING RANCH STORIES. Such being the case I'll tell yuh about them right now.

First comes JACKIE OF THE OPEN RANGE, a grand romantic novelet by Stephen Payne. Seems that Jackie Hearndon was the daughter of a sheepman and a right pretty little gal. Trouble was that her father had a hard time finding a spot where he could graze his flock in peace, especially in cattle country.

So when a young rancher named Henry Cole told Dad Hearndon there was plenty of room to graze the sheep up in the Porcupine Hills, the old man moved there with the flock and his wife and daughter. They had just settled down there when a good-looking young feller in range clothes rode up to the wagon where Jackie was washing her hair. She asked his name.

"I'm Lance Arthur," he said. "I own the Slash A outfit, over on Little Bear Creek, and this happens to be my cattle range."

"There are no cattle on it," Jackie said quickly, defensively. "It's open range, Mr. Arthur."

They didn't quarrel about it—at least Jackie and Lance didn't, but her father ordered the owner of the Slash A to keep away from the sheep camp. Lance was looking for his cattle that had been on this range and were now missing, and so he rode away.

Later Jackie rode over to the Slash A ranch and impulsively decided to cook Lance a good meal and have it all ready when he showed up. He was mighty pleased when he found her there—but while they were eating, Ike Watson, owner of the IW, and the big cowman in that neck of the woods, showed up. Watson was feeling right proddy and he accused Lance of shoving off all his Slash A cattle onto IW range.

Lance Arthur denied that he moved the cattle there—but when Watson saw Jackie and learned she was the sheepman's daughter, that made him all the more sure that a trick had been played on him. From that moment on there's plenty of peril for Lance and Jackie—but just how the trouble on the range is straightened out, and how Jackie finds love, makes JACKIE OF THE OPEN RANGE a mighty entertaining yarn!

Then there is THE MONTANA KNIGHT, the fascinating novelet by Shirley Manners which also appears in the next issue. When Glenda Allen's father died, leaving her alone in the world, her uncle took over the Bar X O ranch, where the girl had been born and brought up.

Glenda believed the Bar X O would be hers when Sam Allen passed away. But hardly two days had elapsed after her father's funeral before Glenda's uncle, Clint Starbuck, produced Allen's notes and claimed that from time to time he had loaned the rancher money. There was nothing Glenda could do about it except turn over the ranch and move out.

After that Glenda went to work for Chet Gaffney, who owned the feed and grain store in the town, and lived at a boarding house.

But she was haunted by the departure of Hap Warren, who had been the foreman of the Bar X O but refused to work for Starbuck and left. He said good-by to Glenda, telling her he was going to try his luck out Wyoming way, and promised to write, but she had never heard from him. This made Glenda unhappy for she was in love with Hap and she was sure that he liked her a lot.

And then, when she needed him most—Hap Warren came back to her! What happens from then on makes THE MONTANA KNIGHT a story that packs plenty of excitement and romance!

Another grand novelet in the next issue is COURAGEOUS GIRL, by Thelma Knoles. Jinny Pennington was from the East and so it was pretty hard for her to convince the man she loved that she was the sort of gal who could spend her life in the cow country. You'll find her escapades mighty fascinating.

There will also be a careful selection of shorter romantic yarns and interesting features in the next issue. Plenty of good reading for everyone! See you all then, folks!

—TEX BROWN.

WAR VETERANS, ATTENTION!

DURING the past few months this magazine has received a number of inquiries from Veterans of World War II, asking us for information regarding the opportunities for establishing themselves in a business, or securing employment in the Western states. We feel that these boys are certainly entitled to authentic and up-to-the-minute information that will be a guide to them in planning their future.

We have therefore sought the cooperation of State authorities in the various Western states and have on file data that will prove interesting to any War veteran, or any other reader who has plans for heading into the great open spaces. If your hopes for the future are tied up in a farm or ranch in the West, drop us a line, giving us some idea of the place you're chiefly interested in, and what you want to do there. Enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope for the reply.

Typical of the information being placed at our disposal by State officials is the attached letter from L. G. (Pat) Flannery, Executive Manager of the Department of Commerce and

[Turn page]

Entertainment on Every Page of Popular Crossword Puzzles
Now on Sale—Only 10c At All Stands!

FREE

● It's my outright "get acquainted" gift—a bound book of 150 ELECTRICAL SHOP PRINTS & DIAGRAMS of fullsize 8½" x 11". It's yours FREE.

FOR MERELY EXAMINING THIS NEW BOOK ON Electronics Servicing

Now you can easily understand the principles, operation and servicing of electronic equipment—the newest phase of electricity and radio. 600 pages. Simple explanations of electronic tubes for welding and other industrial application, phototubes, gas and vacuum filled tubes, etc. A practical book for (OLD-TIME) or BEGINNERS in electricity or radio. Praised by educators, union officials, superintendents, etc.

SEND NO MONEY Here's my offer—send coupon below. I'll send you my new Electronics book for 7 days examination and my book of 150 Shop Prints which is an outright gift to you. If you like the Electronics book send $4.95 after 7 days. If not return the book and you owe nothing. In either case, however, the book of 150 Shop Prints is yours to keep free. Offer limited—rush coupon.

FREE GIFT BOOK COUPON

H.C. Lewis, Pres., Coyne Electrical School, Dept. 86-TS
500 S. PAULINA STREET, CHICAGO 12, ILLINOIS

Send me ELECTRONICS for ELECTRICIANS for BEGINNERS. Also send me bound volume of 150 Shop Prints which I am to keep FREE whether I keep the ELECTRONICS book or not. I'll either return the Electronics book in 7 days and owe you nothing, or send you $4.95. I'll keep the book I am also to get one year of technical bulletins free.

NAME _____ Age _____
ADDRESS _____
TOWN _____ Zone _____ STATE _____

Latest styles EYE GLASSES ORDER BY MAIL
16 DAYS TRIAL
AS LOW AS $1.89 PAIR

MONEY BACK
Guarantee: Your money refunded if not entirely satisfied with glasses.

SEND NO MONEY
FREE Catalog and Eye Chart. Write today. Take advantage of big money savings. We repair broken glasses. Full prescriptions.
MODERN STYLE SPECTACLES, INC.
53 W. Jackson Blvd., Dept. M-33, Chicago, Ill.

LAW

STUDY AT HOME FOR PERSONAL SUCCESS
and LARGER EARNINGS. 37 years experience—over 108,000 students enrolled. LL.B. Degree awarded. All texts furnished. Easy payments. Send for FREE BOOK.
AMERICAN EXTENSION SCHOOL OF LAW
Dept. 68-T, 645 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11, Ill.

MEN

This Horseshoe Ring, Handmade, Hand engraved, inlaid with simulated pearl, is a KNOCKOUT! Shoe and shank of everlasting Monel Metal is

GUARANTEED 20 YEARS
Supply is limited... rush your order! SEND NO MONEY. Pay Postman only $3.85, plus excise tax and postage. Return for refund in five days if not delighted. State size. Address: Dept. 500-H
NATIONAL JEWELRY CO., Wheeling, W. Va.

AVAILABLE for IMMEDIATE DELIVERY!

Radio—5 tube
A. C. and D. C.
28-95 & 38-95

Automatic Electric Irons
6-95 & 8-95

Plain Electric Irons
4-95 & 5-95

Electric Curling Irons
2-49 & 2-95

Electric Toasters
4-45 & 7-95

Electric Cookers—2-burners
6-95 & 8-95

Enclose deposit with order—balance C. O. D.
Send 3¢ stamp for illustrated catalog listing over 600 hard-to-get items—Electric Appliances, Cooking Utensils, Hardware, etc.

JOSEPH WINKLER & CO.
671 N. CLARK ST., Dept. Y-6, CHICAGO 10, ILL.

USED Correspondence Courses

Complete HOME-STUDY COURSES and self-instruction textbooks, slightly used, tested, well packaged. All subjects, 100% satisfaction. Cash paid for used courses. Full details & 100-page illustrated brochure calling FREE.

Write Nelson Co., 1139 S. Wabash Ave., Dept. 2-06, Chicago 5, ILL.

Acid Indigestion

Relieved in 5 Minutes or Double Your Money Back

When excess stomach acid causes painful, suffering gas, sour stomach and heartburn, doctors usually prescribe the fastest-acting medicines known for symptomatic relief—medicines like those in Bell-ane Tablets. No laxative, Bell-ane brings comfort in a fifty or double your money back on return of bottle to us. 55¢ at all drugists.

OLD LEG TROUBLE

Every one who Viscoee Method heals MANY old leg sores caused by leg congestion, varicose veins, swollen legs and injuries or no cost for TRIAL. Describe your trouble and get FREE BOOK.

T. G. VISCOEE METHOD COMPANY
140 N. Dearborn Street, Chicago, Illinois

WANT A PATENT?

Two FREE BOOKS tell you steps you must take, how we work with you, give other valuable information. Get books and valuable "Evidence of Invention" form today. Write Victor J. Evans & Co. 107-G Merlin Building, Washington 6, D. C.

ASTHMA . . . HAY FEVER ?

IF YOU SUFFER from the discomforts of non-cardiac ASTHMA or HAY FEVER then find out about the wonderful relief you can get from ASTHENE now, a crystalline tablet formula which for nearly a score of years has given joyful relief to thousands. Contains rich concentration of Vitamin C and other valuable ingredients. Send $2.00 TODAY for 10 day trial as a Special Introductory Offer with MONEY BACK GUARANTEE. Or Send No Money—just mail a postcard and we will forward it C.O.D.

UNIVERSAL MEDICAL COMPANY, Dept. TG-1
1408 S. Polaris Rd., Chicago 23, Illinois

Industry of the State of Wyoming. Mr. Flannery says:

This is in reply to your letter concerning possibilities in this country for returning veterans. (I happen to be one myself—an old retard.)

I know this state like a book—have roamed it for twenty-five years. Have seen quite a little of just about every other kind of country there is, too. And if there is any other place that offers real opportunity to returning veterans, I haven't found it. Wyoming is the land of tomorrow's opportunity.

But the veteran has to be a right guy to start with—with confidence, strength and energy—ready to work hard, take setbacks with a grin, get knocked down and bounce back for more. We can't use those who think the world owes them a living and are out to collect. But we do have room for plenty who are ready to put out and take it, with an eye to the future. Men who will develop the possibilities that are here.

A reclamation program for Wyoming is in the planning stage. Involves ultimate construction of dams and reservoirs to cost more than $200,000,000. Will double the state's irrigated farm and ranch lands. Means new cities and towns. Homes for many thousands of new citizens. Means great quantities of electric power for new industries.

In addition, the state has $4,000,000 saved up for public postwar work. (Quite a little for a state of only 250,000 people.)

Wyoming has more coal than any other state. Enough known deposits to supply the present demands of the whole world for about a thousand years. It has untouched mountains of iron ore and other metals. It has room—lots of room. Atomic bombs would have to fly quite a distance to hit us. Industry, reluctant or otherwise, is beginning to look our way.

I think Wyoming has the most invigorating climate on earth. Dry, clear cold in winter that

THRILLING RANCH STORIES

10 East 40th Street,
New York 16, N. Y.

DEAR TEX: Please enroll me as a member of THE BRANDING FIRE CLUB and send me my membership identification card. I agree to be active in keeping the Branding Fire burning.

Name

Address

City

State Age.....

Favorite Hobbies

I am enclosing a stamped self-addressed envelope in which you are to mail my membership card.

Signed

Date

Foreign orders are required to send International Reply Coupons or American Stamps. 6-46 makes you feel good, and hardly a summer night when a blanket isn't welcome. High, clean air every day that you can fairly taste—you enjoy taking it into your lungs.

Close to nature. Not a city where fifteen minutes in your car won't take you to mountains, forests, or open country. Twenty thousand miles of mountain trout streams. Thirty thousand acres of fishing lakes. Largest herds of elk and antelope on earth. Plenty of deer, bear, birds and other game.

Banker and his wife went out the other morning. One got a deer, the other an antelope. Dressed their meat. Took it to quick-freeze locker. Had his bank open by 10 A.M.

Yes, sir, it's quite a country, especially for young man who wants to work with an eye on tomorrow. America's future vacation and recreation land. More accommodations for visitors needed—lodges, camps, dude ranches, etc.

Biggest problem today is not enough homes. New citizens who have come to live with us and returning vets have every city and town jam-packed. Families have to double or triple up. When materials and labor are again available this state will have a home building boom worth seeing—and plenty of other construction.

That's what Mr. Flannery has to say about Wyoming. He's a straight talker, and gives you the dope right from the shoulder. So if you'd like to consider the West as your new home, let's hear about it, and we'll try to steer you right!

Approved by Parents and Teachers!

TRUE ADVENTURES OF THE WORLD'S GREATEST HEROES!

Real LIFE

10¢ COMICS NO. 32

THE ARCTIC CRUSADE

SHARON F. HARRIS
APPLETON
MERCER

Now on Sale 10c At All Stands

START NOW TOWARD A FUTURE IN REFRIGERATION and AIR CONDITIONING

Refrigeration and Air Conditioning are among the great industries of America. Such industries need men who KNOW. Many men servicing and installing equipment are making large incomes.

Spare Time Training

If mechanically inclined, get the training you need to qualify for experience installing and servicing refrigeration and Air Conditioning in stores, offices, homes.

Then you should have no difficulty getting started in these great industries. As experience, tools and a personal following are acquired, you may find it practical, later, to start your own REFRIGERATION and AIR CONDITIONING SHOP.

Rush Coupon Below Today!

Practical Interesting Training

You'll like our way of training—through capable home-study instruction followed by practice on actual equipment under watchful eyes of seasoned Refrigeration and Air Conditioning men in our shops. You'll get top-rate instructions—the easy way. So get the facts now—FREE of obligation. Write TODAY—SURE!

GET VALUABLE FACTS FREE

UTILITIES ENGINEERING INSTITUTE Dept. R-11
1314 W. GELDEN AVE., CHICAGO 14, ILL.

Please send me the Free Facts about opportunities in Air Conditioning and Mechanical Refrigeration. I marked the one that interests me most.

☐ Air Conditioning ☐ Mechanical Refrigeration

NAME _____ Age _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ Zone _____ STATE _____

High School Course

at Home Many Finish in 2 Years

Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Course equivalent to resident school work—prepares for college entrance exams. Standard U.S. texts supplied. Diploma. Credit for U. S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. High school education is very important for advancement in business and industry and socially. Don't be handicapped all your life. See a High School graduate. Start your training now. Free Bulletin on request. No obligation.

American School, Dept. HA58, Grexist 58th, Chicago 37

ASTHMA

Symptoms Relieved. Write today for free information and special money back offer.

W. K. STERLINE, 830 Ohio Ave., Sidney, Ohio

I Guarantee Complete Satisfaction of Your MONEY BACK

Save money. Send for FREE List of Fine Diamonds. Wonderful values. Hundreds of Beautiful Gems.

Excludes Selling

Unredeemed loan pledges and big buying power enable us to offer Fine Diamonds at prices far less than original cost. Send us FREE for INSPECTION AND APPRAISAL. Write for FREE List.

PRUDENTIAL LOAN ASSOCIATION

133 N. Clark Street • Dept. 75-F • Chicago 2, Illinois

ANY PHOTO ENLARGED

Size 8 x 10 Inches or DOUBLE-WEIGHT PAPER

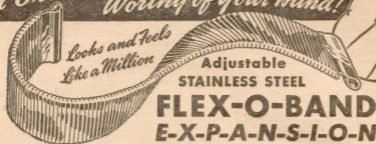

Same price for full length or bust form, groups, landscapes, pet animals, etc., or enlargements of any part of group picture. Original returned with your 3 for $125 enclosed.

SEND NO MONEY Just mail photo, negative or snapshot (any size) and receive your enlargement, guaranteed! Includes one double-weight portrait quality paper. For postpaid 50c min postage and send the money order and we pay postage. Take advantage of this amazing offer now. Send your photos today.

PROFESSIONAL ART STUDIOS
100 East Ohio Street Dept. 408-2 Chicago (11), Ill.

A Grand Band Worthy of Your Hand!

Looks and Feels Like a Million

Adjustable
STAINLESS STEEL

FLEX-O-BAND
E-X-P-A-N-S-I-O-N
WATCH BAND

$2

POST PAID
★
TAX
FREE

Look at These Features

- ★ Fits any watch—any wrist
- ★ Never too loose, never too tight
- ★ Easy-on, easy-off—in a jiffy
- ★ Smart—lightweight—stainless steel

Flex-O-Band Will Enhance the Beauty of Your Watch

—Regardless of Make, Model, Cost!

No matter what that watch of yours cost—Flex-O-Band will add to its appearance, make it look more expensive. Not only that but you'll really enjoy wearing Flex-O-Band. Ornamental as well as useful. Easy to slip over your hand—no clasp or buckle to fuss with. Instantly form-fits your wrist with snug comfort. Never too loose, never too tight—always just right. And it keeps its smart good looks and expensive appearance—made of lustrous stainless steel. Won't tarnish, won't rust. Order your Flex-O-Band right now—better yet, get several for gifts. Money back if not delighted.

14-Kt. GOLD PLATED De Luxe FLEX-O-BAND
with stainless steel tarnish-proof back

$3

POST
★
TAX
FREE
*Mail
Coupon
Today*

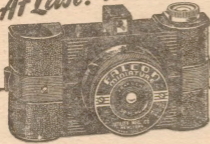

REYNARD-ROYCE, Dept. F32
618 So. Dearborn St., Chicago 5, Ill.

Please send me Flex-O-Band Expansion Watch Bands checked below. If not delighted, I may return within 5 days for refund.

CHECK ONE
☐ Stainless Steel ☐ 1 for $2 ☐ 2 for $3.50 ☐ 3 for $5
☐ Gold Plated ☐ 1 for $3 ☐ 2 for $5.50 ☐ 3 for $8
☐ I am enclosing $_____ payment in full.
☐ Ship C.O.D. I will pay Postman $_____ plus postage.

Name _____
 Address _____
 City _____ Zone _____ State _____

At Last! THE CAMERA YOU'VE BEEN WAITING FOR!

6 FALCON FEATURES YOU'LL LIKE!

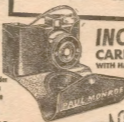

- ★ Simple to load, easy to operate
- ★ Has eye-level centering view finder
- ★ Child can use it—and take good photos
- ★ Fixed lens, Minotar 35MM lens
- ★ Takes 16 pictures on standard 127 film
- ★ Beautiful ebony black plastic cam

NOW YOU CAN TAKE THE PICTURES YOU WANT IN BLACK AND WHITE OR NATURAL FULL COLOR

Old timers know how easy it is to snap pictures with a genuine Falcon Candid Type Camera but more important to you is that even if you've never taken a picture before in your whole life you can quickly learn to use a Falcon—and take all kinds of snapshots and action photos that will surprise and delight you and amaze your family and friends. All you have to do is follow a few easy-to-understand printed directions and you're all set. Then you simply sight your subject through the eye-level view finder—and press the shutter lever. Click—you've taken a picture. It's easy as that with a Falcon—so easy a child can operate it. Thousands of people who never used a camera until they got a Falcon—now have albums full of precious photographs they wouldn't part with for the world. Think of all the fun and pleasure you, too, can have with a Falcon Candid Type Camera—yours for only $3.98, including a personalized carrying case with handy shoulder strap. The coupon will bring you one in a hurry—mail it right NOW.

THE ONE! THE ONLY! THE ORIGINAL!

FALCON $3.98
CANDID TYPE CAMERA POST PAID

INCLUDES CARRYING CASE WITH HANDY SHOULDER STRAP
AT NO EXTRA CHARGE

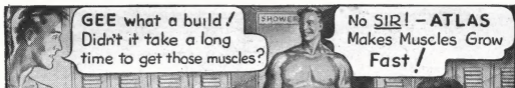

Personalized
WITH YOUR NAME IN 23-KT. GOLD

RUSH THIS COUPON NOW

Sold on a
"Examine At Our Risk" GUARANTEE OF SATISFACTION

Yes, if you do not find that the Falcon is everything you expected, you may return it in 10 days for a complete refund.

ROYALTY PRODUCTS - Dept. F16
847 So. Clark St., Chicago 5, Ill.
Insert into Falcon Camera and Personalized Carrying Case at $3.98 POSTPAID. If not delighted it may be returned within 10 days for refund.
 Check here if you desire Analysis (No. 127 Film for $1.02. Name wanted in gold.)
 Check one and write in either $3.98 or $5.98 depending upon whether you want film or not.
☐ I'm enclosing $_____ in full payment. Send my order POSTPAID.
☐ Send me order C.O.D. I am enclosing $1.00 deposit because I want my Carrying Case Personalized in GOLD. My name balance of $_____ after payment.
☐ Send my order C.O.D. without charge on Carrying Case. I will pay postage $_____ plus postage.
 Name _____
 Address _____
 City _____ Zone _____ State _____

Will You Let Me PROVE I Can Make YOU a New Man?

LET ME START SHOWING YOU RESULTS LIKE THESE

 5 inches of new Muscle <small>"My arms increased 2 1/2", chest 2 1/2", forearm 3/8", 100 lbs. G. S. W. Va."</small>	 What a difference! <small>"I have put 34 1/2" on chest normal and 2 1/2" expanded."—F. S. N. Y."</small>
 Here's what ATLAS did for ME! <small>John Jacobs BEFORE John Jacobs AFTER</small>	 For quick results I recommend CHARLES ATLAS <small>"Am sending snapshot showing wonderful progress."—W. G. N. J."</small>

GAINED 29 POUNDS
"When I started, weighed only 142 lbs. Now, 170."—T. K. N. Y."

CHARLES ATLAS

This is a recent photo of Charles Atlas—not a studio picture but an actual untouched snapshot.
 Awarded the title of "The World's Most Perfectly Developed Man" in international competition with ALL men who would consent to appear against him.

Here's What Only 15 Minutes a Day Can Do For You

I DON'T care how old or young you are, or how ashamed of your present physical condition you may be. If you can simply raise your arm and flex it I can add BUILD MUSCLE to your biceps—yes, on each arm—in double-quick time! Only 15 minutes a day—right in your own home—is all the time I ask of you! And there's no cost if I fail.

I can broaden your shoulders, strengthen your back, develop your whole muscular system INSIDE and OUTSIDE! I can add luster to your chest, give a vice-like grip, make those legs of yours lithe and powerful. I can shoot new strength into your old backbone, exercise those inner organs, help you cream your body so full of pep, vigor and red-blooded vitality that you won't feel there's even "standing room" left for weakness and that lazy feeling! Before I get through with you I'll have your whole frame "measured" to a nice, new, beautiful suit of muscle!

with. When you have learned to develop your strength through "Dynamic Tension" you can laugh at artificial muscle-makers. You simply utilize the DORMANT muscle-power in your own God-given body—watch it increase and multiply double-quick into real solid MUSCLE.

My method—"Dynamic Tension"—will turn the trick for you. No theory—every exercise is practical. And, man, so easy! Spend only 15 minutes a day in your own home. From the very start you'll be using my method of "Dynamic Tension" almost unconsciously every minute of the day—walking, bending over, etc.—to BUILD MUSCLE AND VITALITY.

FREE BOOK

"Everlasting Health and Strength"

In it I talk to you in straightforward - the - shoulder language, packed with inspirational pictures of myself and souls-fellows who became NEW MEN in strength, my way. Let me show you what I helped THEM do. See what I can do for YOU! For a real thrill, send for this book today. AT ONCE CHARLES ATLAS, Dept. 77F, 115 East 23rd St., New York 10, N. Y.

CHARLES ATLAS, Dept. 77F
 115 East 23rd St., New York 10, N. Y.

I want the proof that your system of "Dynamic Tension" will help make a New Man of me—give me a healthy, husky body and big muscular development. Send me your free book, "Everlasting Health and Strength."

Name (Please print or write plainly)
 Address
 City State

What's My Secret?

"Dynamic Tension!" That's the ticket! The identical natural method that I myself developed to change my body from the scrawny, skinny-chested weakling I was at 17 to my present super-man physique! Thousands of other fellows are becoming marvelous physical specimens—my way. I give you no gadgets or contraptions to fool

Protect Yourself and Your Loved Ones with NEW FAMILY PLAN for

HOSPITAL and SURGICAL INSURANCE

Costs only 3¢ a Day for Adults · 1½¢ a Day for Children

DARLING, THIS STERLING CHECK
CERTAINLY HELPS!

Every 2½ seconds someone enters a hospital! YOU—or someone in your family—may be next! Good hospital insurance is important. Provide cash to help pay the many bills that pile up when accident, sickness, or a needed operation sends you or a member of your family to the hospital. At special low family rates this new Sterling Family Hospital and Surgical Policy provides cash benefits to help pay your expenses for hospital room and board, operating room, X-ray, anesthetic, medicines, and other stated hospital expenses—and also for doctor's fee for operations. One policy covers each and every member of your family.

SPECIAL FAMILY RATES—Take the Expense Out of Hospital Care now in good health, from 3 months old to 65 years.

You are not limited to just one hospitalization—this policy pays benefits no matter how many times you or any insured member of your family has to go to the hospital, up to 90 days in any policy year for EACH person, as provided. The money is paid direct to you, and you may use any doctor and any hospital anywhere. You may insure as many in the family as you wish—anyone

Insure With Confidence
This low-cost Family Hospital and Surgical Policy is issued by the nationally known Sterling Insurance Company, a legal reserve insurance company with over $2,000,000.00 surplus for policyholders. There are more than 500,000 Sterling-protected men, women and children throughout America. Over $3,000,000.00 cash benefits already paid on Sterling policies, and more being paid every day.

10 DAY TRIAL OFFER—Mail Coupon Today
Rush coupon below now for Policy on 10-Day Trial Offer which gives you opportunity to have actual policy in force protecting you and your family with full benefits while you make up your mind. There's no obligation of any kind... mail this coupon today.

IN ONE POLICY...
PROTECT
FATHER • MOTHER • CHILDREN

FOR YOU and Your Family

HOSPITAL EXPENSES (ROOM AND BOARD)

Pays expenses for Room and Board up to $4.00 a day for as many as 90 days in any policy year—no matter how many times you are in the hospital.
PLUS—A total of $50.00 for additional hospital expenses incurred up to: $10.00 for operating room, $5.00 for laboratory fees, $5.00 for medicines, $10.00 for anesthetics, $10.00 for physiotherapy, $5.00 for X-rays, $5.00 for ambulance services. These benefits payable for EACH hospitalization.

PLUS OPERATION EXPENSES... provides benefits from $5.00 to $100.00 for surgical operations, whether performed in hospital, at home, or in doctor's office.
CHILDREN'S BENEFITS... Pays $4.00 a day for the usual 10-day period of maternity confinement. (After policy is in force 1 year.)

Policy covers accidents immediately... sickness after policy in force 30 days—just a few specified sicknesses require that policy be in force for 6 months.

Sterling Insurance Company
N-4206 Sterling Bldg., Chicago 11, Ill.
Send me, without obligation, your 10-Day Trial Offer of Low-Cost Family Hospital and Surgical Plan. No agent will call.

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE

☐ Check here if you want details of new Life Insurance Plan at 1/3 cost for first 3 years.

NO AGENT WILL CALL

STERLING INSURANCE Co.

N-4206 Sterling Bldg.

Chicago 11, Ill.